The next objection to the Judgment, is, that the Court refused to permit the Defendant to demur generally, and afterwards specially, to the Declaration of the Plaintiffs. As to the latter, the special demurrer, it certainly came too late after issue joined on some of the pleas, and the Court had sustained the demurrer of the Plaintiffs to one of the pleas of the Defendant; and, therefore, as to the former, the general demurrer, it does not appear that it was calculated to produce any delay, and went to the merits. Yet, the refusal to receive it, by the Court, did not prejudice the Defendant, as he had the full benefit of it by his demurrer to one of the Plaintiff's replications to another of his pleas; it being a settled rule of pleading, that when pleadings terminate in a demurrer, (on either side,) it mounts up to the first error in the pleadings of either side. Nor is there any thing in the 103d section of the Act of Jeofails, 1 Rev. Code, 511, which prohibits a Judgment 187 *after verdict to be stayed or reversed, for any defect which might have been taken advantage of by demurrer, and which shall not have been so taken advantage of, that can affect the rule stated. It certainly does not include verdicts, in a case in which there is a demurrer to the pleadings by either party. It has been often decided by this Court, that when there is an issue in Law and in fact in any case, the issue in Law should be first decided; in which case, there might be no verdict. But, if the suggestion be correct, that a verdict in such case would cure the errors not taken advantage of by demurrer coming from the Defendant, the issue in fact ought in all cases first to be tried. But in truth, that question does not arise in this case, as there is a demurrer to the pleadings, both by the Plaintiffs and the Defendant; and he is, therefore, entitled to his objections to the Declaration, if there is any force in them.

The Declaration is very inartificially drawn; but I think, would be held to be substantially good on a general demurrer. The complaint is of a plea of debt, &c. It sets out the Judgment on which it is founded, and alleges, that it was in full force and unsatisfied, and of the value of 60l.; it being really a Judgment for 50l. 9s. 10d., and one penny damages, and $8 1 cent cost, to be discharged by the payment of 25l. 7s. 4 1-2, and the damages and costs aforesaid; whereby an action accrued to the Plaintiffs to demand and have of the Defendant the sum of money last mentioned, the amount of the Judgment aforesaid. It then proceeds to allege the demand and refusal to pay, &c., in the usual form; to which there is no objection; and I think enables the Court to give Judgment according to the very right of the case, not noticing errors in matters of form; which could only be noticed on special demurrer according to the Act of Jeofails.

The objection to the verdict, I think, is equally unavailing. It finds the sum of 50l., that being the debt in the Declaration mentioned, and $60 in damages, for 188 *which the Judgment is rendered; when in fact, the debt in the Declaration mentioned is 50l. 19s. 10d. and $8 1 cent. In substance, it finds, that the debt in the Declaration has not been paid, as alleged by the pleas; and the only incongruity is in stating it to be 50l., which is surplusage; as the finding of the debt in the Declaration mentioned, was sufficient to have justified a Judgment for that sum, and the $60 damages; which latter, in an action on a Judgment for a penal sum, the Jury were at liberty to give for the detention of the debt. The error, therefore, complained of, is in favor of the Defendant, and not to be complained of by him.

The Judgment is to be affirmed.

March, 1828.

Creditors at Large—Right to Interfere with Disposition of Debtor's Property.—A creditor cannot have the aid of a Court of Equity to prevent, or interfere with, in any way, the disposition which his debtor may make of his property, unless the creditor has first proceeded as far as he can at Law. To subject real estate, he must have ob-

Creditors at Large—Right to Interfere with Disposition of Debtor's Property.—Previous to the enactment of § 2, ch. 179, Code of 1860, it was the settled rule of the courts, that a creditor at large could not resort to a court of equity, to impeach any conveyance made by his debtor, on the ground of fraud. If real estate was the subject of the conveyance, a judgment was regarded as sufficient. If goods and chattels or any equitable interest therein although incapable of being levied on, were embraced in the conveyance, the creditor was required to take out execution and have it levied or returned, so as to show that his remedy at law had failed. Wallace v. Treake, 27 Gratt. 486, citing the principal case, to sustain the proposition. And in Zell Guano Co. v. Heatherly, 88 W. Va. 415, 18 S. E. Rep. 612, it is tained a Judgment at Law; and to subject personal estate, he must have a Judgment and execution.

Ne Exeat—When Granted.—A Writ of Ne Exeat cannot be granted, unless 1. There is a precise amount of debt positively due; 2. It must be an Equitable demand, on which the Plaintiff cannot sue at Law, except in cases of account, and a few others of concurrent jurisdiction; 3. The Defendant must be about to quit the Country, proved by affidavits as positive as those required to hold to bail at Law.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Richmond, where Cousins filed his bill against Grymes, Rhodes and Moore, praying for an Injunction to prohibit a sale of certain goods which had been conveyed (fraudulently, as he alleged) by Deed of Trust from Grymes to Rhodes; or, that the goods might be returned by Moore the auctioneer, to the other Defendants; or, to stay $1,500 in the hands of Moore, if a sale should be thought proper; or to grant a Ne Exeat. The whole ground of complaint is fully set forth in the following opinion.

Wickham, for the Appellant.

May and Spooner, for the Appellee.

March 15. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

The bill presents this case: that in the winter of 1820-21, Cousins endorsed for Grymes (a grocer) an accommodation note, to be discounted at the Bank, for $1,500: that the note had been renewed from time to time, and the one last given would become due in about four weeks: that the Plaintiff will, no doubt, have to take up the note when it falls due: that the said money was borrowed to pay debts, which Grymes contracted in supplying his store with groceries: that a few days before, he had been surprised to discover in a Petersburg paper (where the parties live,) an advertisement of the stock of goods belonging to Grymes, to be sold on the 11th of September, by a certain Jer. Rhodes, an Englishman, having no fixed residence here, and who had avowed his intention of returning in a short time to England: that, on enquiry of Grymes, he told him, that being a secret partner, Rhodes had obtained a Deed of Trust from him by deception and fraud; and under it, was about to sell the goods. He charges, that Rhodes has been a sleeping partner since the last fall: that he has reason to believe that he will leave this Country with all his effects, if not prevented, before the note becomes due, previous to which time, the Plaintiff can have no redress at Law: that Grymes is insolvent: that the goods are in possession of Moore an auctioneer. The prayer of the bill is, that an Injunction issue to prohibit a sale, or a return of the goods by Moore to the other Defendants; or to stay $1,500 in the hands of Moore, if a sale be thought proper; or to grant a Ne Exeat.

Taking this matter up simply upon the case made by the bill, it is clear to me, that the Plaintiff had no right to the aid of Equity, either by way of Injunction or Ne Exeat.

1. As to the Injunction. It is well settled Law, that none but a Judgment-creditor can have the assistance of Equity to control, prevent, or interfere with, in any way, the disposition which a debtor may choose to make of his property. He may destroy it, give it away, convey it fraudulently, or sell it and waste the money, and no creditor at large can stop him by Injunction. A creditor must have proceeded as far as he can at Law. If he means to affect the land, he must have a Judgment, and take his elegit. If the personalty, there must be Judgment and execution issued; and he must show in his bill that he has done this, or it may be demurred to. See Mitf. Pl. 114-15; Angel v. Draper, 1 Vern. 399; Shirley v. Watts, 3 Atk. 200; Bennett v. Musgrave, 2 Ves. sen. 51; Balch v. Wastall, 1 P. Wms. 451; Cooper's Equ. Pl. 149; see also Wiggins v. Armstrong, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 144. That case was thus: Plaintiff had two notes on D. to a large amount, on which D. confessed a Judgment to a greater amount to another person. The bill charged a fraudulent collusion: that the Judgment was voluntary and without consideration, and with intent, to defraud the Plaintiff; and he prayed an Injunction against proceeding on the Judgment by execution. An Injunction was granted. No answer was put in; but a motion was made to dissolve, on the ground that the Plaintiff, not being a Judgment-creditor, had no lien on the property of the debtor, and no right to question the Judgments. The Chancellor reviews the cases with his usual care, and comes to the conclusion, that a creditor at large, and before Judgment and execution, cannot be entitled to the interference of Equity. He remarks, very sensibly, "The reason of the 191 rule seems to be, that until the creditor has established his title, he has no right to interfere; and it would lead to an unnecessary, and perhaps, a fruitless and oppressive interruption of the exercise of the debtor's rights. Unless he has a certain claim upon the property of the debtor, he has no concern with his frauds."

The same doctrine is again discussed and considered as settled in 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 284, 4 Do. 671, 682. This Court, also, in the case of Chamberlayne v. Temple, 2 Rand. 384, lays down the doctrine in the same way, and strongly and forcibly illustrates the mischiefs and inconveniences of a contrary proceeding.

In the case before us, the Plaintiff not only had no Judgment, but he was not even a creditor. True, he had endorsed a note for Grymes; but, he might never be called on to pay it; or called on, he might not be able to pay it; and in either case, he could have no demand on Grymes. What said: "In Rhodes v. Cousins (1828), 6 Rand. (Va.) 188, 190. CARR, J. says: 'It is well-settled law that none but a judgment creditor can have the assistance of equity to control, prevent or interfere with, in any way, the disposition which a debtor may choose to make of his property. He may destroy it, give it away, convey it fraudulently, or sell it and waste the money, and no creditor at large can stop him by injunction.' There must be some specific right of the creditor against the property sought to be subjected, and, having no certain claim upon the property of the debtor, he has no concern with his frauds. To same effect, see Tate v. Liggat (1830), 2 Leigh 84; Kelso v. Blackburn (1831), 8 Leigh 299; McCullough v. Sommerville (1830), 8 Leigh 415. These cases lead in this state (Virginia) to the enactment of the statute in question."

right, then, had he to claim the interference of Equity, to disturb the arrangement made between Grymes and Rhodes; to forbid the sale of the goods; and to take them wholly, from the possession of the owners, for an indefinite space of time?

2. Just as unfounded seems to be the attempt of the Plaintiff to obtain a Writ of Ne Exeat against the Defendant Rhodes, and his effects. As no such Writ was issued, I shall pursue that subject no further than just to remark, that our Act of Assembly does not regulate the proceeding on the Ne Exeat further than to say, (1 Rev. Code, 217, sec. 110,) that Writs of Ne Exeat shall not be granted, but upon bill filed, and affidavits made to the truth of its allegations: that if granted, the Court or Judge shall direct to be endorsed thereon in what penalty bond and security shall be required of the Defendant; and that if the Defendant shall, by answer, satisfy the Court or Judge, that there is no reason for his restraint, or give sufficient security to perform the Decree, the Writ may be discharged. What the allegations in the bill shall be to justify the Writ, 192 "the Law has left to the Court, who must be guided by the rules settled in such cases. The Ne Exeat, as now understood and practised upon, is a proceeding in Equity to obtain bail, in a case where there is a debt due in Equity, though not at Law; for, if it be a legal debt, then you may take bail at Law, and Equity will not entertain you, except in cases of account, and perhaps a few other cases of concurrent jurisdiction. The general rule is, that where you can get bail at Law, Equity will not grant the Writ. In the exercise of this power, Courts of Equity are very cautious, as it is a strong step, tending to abridge the liberty of the citizen. To induce that Court to issue a Ne Exeat, it must appear, 1st, that there is a precise amount of debt positively due: 2d, that it is an equitable demand, upon which the Plaintiff cannot sue at Law, except as before, in account, and some other cases of concurrent jurisdiction: 3d, that the Defendant is about quitting the Country, to avoid the payment. As to the first, in Jackson v. Petrie, 10 Ves. 163, Lord Eldon says, "The affidavit must be as positive as to the equitable debt, as an affidavit of a legal debt, to hold to bail; nor do I recollect, that this Court has granted the Writ upon an affidavit stating merely information and belief as to the amount of the debt, except where it is matter of pure account." In Haffey v. Haffey, 14 Ves. 261, Lord Eldon mentions a very hard case, to show that under circumstances, which would not entitle you to bail if your demand was a legal one, you shall not have it in Equity. It was decided by Lord Thurlow. A bond was payable on the 1st of January. The obligor, by agreement, obtained indulgence till the 1st of July. In the last week of June, he declared his intention of leaving the Kingdom, to evade payment. There was the agreement and the bond; yet it was held, that as under that agreement which prevented the obligee from getting bail at Law, the money was not due in Equity, he could not have the Writ. To obtain the Writ, it is also necessary that the affidavit must be positive 193 as "to the Defendant's intention to go abroad, as to his threats or declarations to that effect, or to facts evincing it. In Odham v. Odham, 7 Ves. 210, the Court said, in relation to this, "It is not sufficient to show that another person said so."

In the case before us, there is no debt due. If due, it would be a legal debt, on which bail at Law might be demanded. There is no sufficient affidavit of intention to leave the Country. The Courts in England have thought these guards necessary to protect the personal liberty of the subject; and we, surely, cannot think them less so here.

On every ground, then, this bill, taking it as true, is insufficient, and should never have been received. I have put the case on the strongest ground for the Plaintiff; for, he could not do more than prove his case; and in truth, he has fallen far short of it. I am clear that the Decree be reversed, and the bill dismissed.

Upon the subject of the Writ of Ne Exeat, I refer to the following cases: 2 Ves. senr. 489; 3 P. Wms. 312; 3 Bro. Ch. Cas. 218; 2 Atk. 210; 1 Ves. junr. 94; 5 Ves. 91; 6 Ves. 163, 283; 7 Ves. 171-2, 8 Ves. 593; 9 Ves. 464; 16 Ves. 163; 11 Ves. 54; 14 Ves. 261; 15 Ves. 444; 16 Ves. 470; 18 Ves. 352; 1 Ves. & Beam. 372; Jac. & Walk. Rep. 405; 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 1; 2 Do. 169. See also Beame's Brief View of the Writ of Ne Exeat, passim.

The other Judges concurred, and the Decree was reversed, and the bill dismissed.

Equitable Relief—Execution.—It is a general rule, that where slaves are improperly taken in execution, the owner may claim the aid of a Court of Equity to prevent their sale.

Same—Same.—But, if it can be shown, that such slaves have no peculiar value in the eyes of their owner, but are merely regarded by him as any other property, Equity ought not to interfere, but leave him to his redress at Law.

Injunction—Dissolution.—It is an irregular proceeding in a Chancellor, to dissolve an Injunction in Court, with a direction that the order of dissolution should not go out; and then, in vacation, to direct that the order should go out.

Same—Same—Appeal.—From such an order an appeal lies to the Court of Appeals.

such fact must be taken as true on a motion to dissolve; and no other proof will be required on such motion.

Administrator—Judgment against—Levy on Property Distributed.—Where personal property of a testator or intestate has been distributed to legatees or distributees of the decedent, with the assent of his executor or administrator, it is not competent to a creditor of the decedent to levy his execution on such property, under a Judgment obtained against the personal representative.

This was an appeal from the Richmond Chancery Court. The following opinions will give a full view of the case. It was submitted without argument.

March 19. JUDGE CARR.

Henry Randolph, at the sale of the estate of Archibald Cary, became a purchaser of property to the amount of 166l. for which he gave his bond with Brett Randolph as surety. Henry Randolph died; his widow administered on his estate. After some years, Cary's executor sued Brett Randolph on the bond, and obtained Judgment. Brett Randolph paid the money, and moved against the administratrix for it. He recovered a Judgment. She appealed to this Court, and the Judgment was affirmed. Brett Randolph then levied his execution on four slaves; when Catharine and Georgiana Randolph, daughters of Henry Randolph, filed a Bill of Injunction to stay the sale; stating, that some years before, a division of their father's estate had taken place, with the assent of 195 *the administratrix, on which the slaves taken in execution had been allotted to them, and had been held by them ever since, as their separate property; and therefore, were not liable to an execution against their father's estate. The Chancellor refused the Injunction. This Court granted it.

The Defendant answered, stating, among other things, that as to the division spoken of, if any such had taken place, (which he did not admit) it ought not to obstruct his execution, as the property was liable for his debt; but, whether liable or not, Equity ought not to interfere, as the Plaintiffs had a complete remedy at Law.

A replication was taken to this answer; but, no evidence was adduced to establish the division of the estate. On motion, the Chancellor, on the 27th of June, 1826, dissolved the Injunction, but directed the order not to go out. Then follows this entry in the record: "Needham, 19th July, 1826: By the Chancellor. There is no ground which I am able to discover for the interference of a Court of Equity. The case, as it seems to me, was most clearly mistaken, and, regarding the order for the Injunction as improvident, the dissolution of it at the last Term was correct, and a copy of the order for it may now go out."

From this, it would seem, that the order of dissolution was given in Court, but its operation suspended by another order, till the case should be considered in the vacation following, and the mandate received, which should give effect to the whole. Had the Chancellor the power to act upon the case thus in vacation? That he cannot dissolve an Injunction in the Country, is clear. That must be done in Court. Yet, is not this order, made at Needham, in effect the dissolution? Is it not that, which gives life and animation to the order made in Court? Without it, the Court order was wholly inefficient; the Injunction, to every practical effect, not dissolved; no execution could issue; and I presume, no appeal from the order could be taken; for it was still sub judice. Suppose, when the Chancellor came to examine the case, 196 he had discovered *that the Court order was improvident; he had only to withhold his mandate from the Country, and every thing would remain in statu quo. I do not think the Chancellor has the power thus exercised.

Considering this last order as the one appealed from, it may be asked, has this Court the power to grant appeals from such orders? I answer, this Court may grant appeals from the dissolution of Injunctions; and this order, (however irregular) has had this effect.

But ought we, on such a proceeding, to take up the case on its merits? If by doing so, we can settle the principles of it, and thereby prevent another appeal for that purpose, perhaps it may be best.

As the division of the property, and the separate holding by the Plaintiffs, formed the sole ground on which they could stand in Equity, and this was not admitted by the answer, I incline to think, that they ought to have been prepared with proof of it, to prevent a dissolution. But, as my brethren (I understand) are against me on this point, I will pass on to the next; that is, has Equity jurisdiction of the case? This, though a question of interest and importance, I shall discuss very briefly.

The general rule is, that where the remedy is complete at Law, Equity cannot interfere. But where, from the peculiar nature of the property in contest, and circumstances of the case, no verdict of a Jury can compensate the claimant, Equity will lend its aid to preserve the property, and give it in specie to the true owner. The question is, whether slaves, when claimed as owner, (not incumbrancer,) are, from their nature merely, such property? This precise question has not been decided by the Court. The earlier cases put it on the ground of specific execution; where we know, every application is to the sound discretion of the Court; and upon the whole case made, the question is, whether the ends of justice will be better attained, by taking or declining jurisdiction. In the case of Allen v. Freeland, 3 Rand. 170, 197 the Plaintiff could hardly be *called the owner; he had (as he pretended) bought the slaves at public sale; had never had them in possession; had paid no money for them; set no particular value on them; and was strongly suspected of fraud. In Bower v. Creigh, 3 Rand. 25, the Plaintiff was an incumbrancer merely. I readily agree that "various causes may ex-

Same—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeals.—In Fredenheim v. Rohr, 87 Va. 769, 13 S. E. Rep. 193, it is said: "This statute (Code of Virginia, 1887, § 4438) confers no original jurisdiction upon one of the judges of this court to award an Injunction, except in the case where the application has been made, first to a judge of an inferior court, either in term or in vacation, and has been refused. Mayo v. Haines & Coutts, 3 Munf. 423; Randolph v. Randolph, 6 Rand. 315; 1 Rand. 415."

ist to give slaves a value in the eyes of the master, which no estimated damages could reach. The slave may have been raised by him, and may possess moral qualities, which, to his master, render him invaluable. He may have saved the life of the master, or some one of his family; and thus have gained a value beyond all price. When any case of this kind is addressed to a Court of Equity, it will interfere, upon the principle, that there is no complete remedy at Law," (as in the cases cited in Bowyer v. Creigh;) and far would I be from obstructing the course of Equity, in the humane office of preserving the slave to his master in such cases. But, to such cases, I would restrict the interference. We must all agree, that there are many cases, in which a slave has no peculiar value with his owner; some, among the large slaveholders, where he is not even personally known; or he may be vicious or worthless. To these, and other such cases, the principle of equitable interference surely would not apply. When, therefore, a party asks the aid of Equity, to take a case from the course of the Common Law, and the Jury trial, (a tribunal peculiarly fitted for such cases,) ought he not to show forth in his bill, the facts and circumstances making such change of forum proper? Is there any hardship in this? Whether the slave has a peculiar value with his master, none can so well know as the master himself. He can speak from his own feelings, his own knowledge. The simple fact of asking the aid of Equity, will hardly be taken as proof, that he sets a peculiar value on the slave, by those who witness the thousands of applications to that tribunal, in cases wholly unfit and improper.

198 *My opinion then is, that to authorise a Court of Chancery to grant an Injunction stopping the sale of a slave under execution, the Plaintiff must claim as owner, and state some fact or circumstance, whether the pretium affectionis or any other, tending to show, that the verdict of a Jury in damages would not compensate him; and that the mere claim of him as his slave, without more, does not authorise the staying such sale under execution.

JUDGE GREEN.

Upon a motion to dissolve an Injunction upon bill and answer, the facts alleged in the bill, and not denied by the answer, should be taken to be true. They stand upon the affidavit of the Plaintiff, and are entitled to as much weight on the motion to dissolve, as upon the original motion for an Injunction. A declaration by the Defendant, that he does not know or admit any particular allegation of the bill to be true, is not a denial; although it is sufficient to put the Plaintiff to the proof of the fact, upon the hearing. In this case, the Defendant does not deny the material allegation, that the slaves, upon which his execution was levied, had been distributed amongst the distributees of his debtor; and it is perfectly clear, that if that be the fact, his execution could not be legally levied upon them; they not being of the goods and chattels of the intestate in the hands of his administratrix to be administered. But, I think it equally clear, that a Court of Equity should not interfere to prevent a creditor from seizing and selling, under his execution, any property which he may think liable to it; unless the property be of such a character, that the owner cannot be fully compensated by the verdict of a Jury, giving him what might be the fair market value of his property; and this can only be, where the property is of such a nature, that it may fairly be supposed to have a peculiar and additional value in the estimation of the owner, the pretium affectionis. The grounds of this 199 opinion have *been so often discussed in this Court, and the principle so completely settled, that it is unnecessary now to state them at large. Whether slaves are, prima facie, a property of this peculiar character, has never been determined; and this case, I think, presents that single question for decision. Fully apprised of the inconveniences of a decision either way, I cannot help thinking, that slaves ought, prima facie, to be so considered. They have moral qualities, which make them, in some instances, peculiarly valuable to their owners; but which could not be the subject of enquiry in each particular case, without great inconvenience and uncertainty. And whatever may be their qualities, we know that attachments naturally and generally grow up between master and slave, which cannot be the subject of pecuniary estimate by a Jury. This prima facie presumption may, however, be repelled by circumstances. As, if the slaves were necessarily to be sold, (as in the case of their being pledged for the payment of debts,) and the question is between a creditor claiming under a specific lien, and one claiming under execution; or, if they were in the hands of the owner as a subject of traffic; in such cases, the injury done to the owner by seizing and selling them, under an execution against another, would be precisely and accurately measured by their market value. He could have full and complete redress at Law; and there would be no ground for the interposition of a Court of Equity, for the purpose of preserving to the owner the property in specie.

I concur in the opinion which has been given, as to the irregularity of dissolving the Injunction in Court, with a direction that the order should not go out, and making a new order in vacation. Upon this ground, I think the order dissolving the Injunction should be reversed, and the Injunction reinstated.

200 *JUDGE COALTER.

The bill states, that the father of the Plaintiffs, who are the Appellants here, died about the year 1804, leaving a widow and several children: that in 1809, a division of the estate took place, and that several of the children have married and left the family; and that the Plaintiffs have been ever since in possession of their portion of the estate, until the execution in the bill mentioned, was levied on certain slaves belonging to them, and thus in their possession. This bill is sworn to in March, 1826.

The answer of the Appellee (who is uncle to the Plaintiffs) does not deny the allegations of the bill, but says, that he does not admit them, and calls for proof; and consequently, if the Injunction was properly allowed, it ought not to have been dissolved, until reasonable time was given to produce the proof so called for. The answer was sworn to in May, 1826; but when it was filed, does not appear on this record. The Plaintiffs instantler replied to it; and on the 27th of June, 1826, the Injunction was dissolved, but the order not to go out. It seems, however, from the record, that a subsequent order was made by the Chancellor, at Needham, his Country residence on the 19th of July, 1826. It is in these words: "By the Chancellor. There is no ground which I can discover for the interference of a Court of Equity. The case, as it seems to me, was most clearly mistaken; and regarding the order for the Injunction as improvident, the dissolution of it, at the last Term, was correct, and the copy of the order for it may now go out." The Injunction had not been awarded by the Chancellor, but had been refused by him; and on an appeal from that refusal, had been granted by the Judges of this Court.

As the Decree of dissolution was suspended by that part of it which directed the order not to go out, I incline to consider it as tantamount to a dissolution and subsequent reinstating the Injunction, and of course, beyond the power 201 *of the Court, except in term time.

I presume, therefore, that that Decree could not then have been appealed from, as the direction not to send out the order rendered it inoperative; and consequently, the Decree was not then injurious. And, besides, I presume the Chancellor retained the record, and took it with him, to Needham; so that no copy could have been furnished, until the confirming Decree, and the directions to issue the order, were returned to the Clerk's office. From that time, the Decree of June became operative and injurious to the party. I am clearly of opinion, that there is no Law authorising the Chancellor to make such Decree and order in vacation, as that of the 19th of July, above mentioned; and I at first doubted, whether, considering that as the Decree appealed from, we had jurisdiction over a decree so pronounced. I understand my brethren fully to concur with me as to the want of power in the Chancellor; but, that they are also of opinion, in which I concur, that inasmuch as the Decree of June is now put into operation, however irregularly that may have been done, it is necessarily from that Decree that the appeal is taken; and that we have, therefore, jurisdiction.

The question then is, whether the Injunction was improvidently awarded by the Judges of this Court, or not? I understand it to have been the constant course of this Court for a series of years, with a few particular exceptions, that where, on an execution against A. the slaves of B. are taken, B. is entitled to an Injunction; and is not forced to permit the execution to proceed; and resort to his legal remedy for damages. The reason given by the Judge who has preceded me, is a sufficient ground for this decision; but, I think another might well be superadded to it. The master has not only his own pecuniary interest to consult, and his own affections and predilections to gratify, in all of which he will be aided by the Courts; but, he owes a duty to the slave, as well as the slave does to the master, and which he ought to perform; the duty of protection from a violent seizure and sale, which may terminate in the 202 destruction *of his happiness, and in breaking asunder all his family ties and connexions. I have known slaves who could not be sold for $20, and whose masters ought to consider themselves bound by ties of real gratitude to avert such a calamity from them, if able to do so, at the expense of hundreds. Surely, such considerations ought to receive the attention and countenance of the Courts.

I therefore think, that the injunction was properly awarded, and that the Decree is erroneous and must be reversed.

JUDGE CABELL.

This is thought to be a fit occasion for the Court to express an opinion on the subject of the interposition of a Court of Equity to prevent the sale of slaves taken in execution.

Slaves are rational beings, and, as such, have moral qualities, which are calculated to render them of peculiar value in the estimation of their masters. It may be laid down as a position almost universal, that the master, unless obliged to sell, would think himself poorly compensated for the loss of a slave, by the price which a Jury might fix upon him. Moreover, slaves are human beings; and therefore, I do not think that even their attachments and feelings are to be disregarded. The inhumanity of wantonly invading these attachments and feelings, forms with me an additional argument in favor of the interference of a Court of Chancery.

I am of opinion, that it should be regarded as a general rule, that the Courts of Chancery are bound to interpose, wherever the slaves of one man are about to be sold to pay the debts of another. The exceptions to this general rule, whatever they may be, are to be brought forward and established, in each particular case, by those who claim the benefit of them.

I think, therefore, that the Injunction was properly awarded; and that it was wrong to dissolve it, without 203 allowing *the Plaintiff time to prove the facts stated in the bill.

Another question presents itself, on which it is deemed expedient that this Court should express its opinion. The order dissolving the Injunction was regularly made and entered in term time; but that order was followed immediately by another, which directed that the order of dissolution should not "go out;" and as the Court rose without taking any further order on the subject, this last order was, in effect, a suspension of the order of dissolution. The removal of the suspension of a former order of the Court, is a judicial act, which can be regularly performed only in open Court, where the parties may be present, and may be heard; or, where they may at least observe what is done affecting their interests. I concur in the opinion, that the order made by the Chancellor was irregular.

THE PRESIDENT.

I think the proceedings in this case, after the Injunction had been dissolved by the Court, cannot affect the right of the Plaintiff to appeal from the decree. I am of opinion, also, that it was premature to dissolve the Injunction, before an opportunity had been afforded to the Plaintiffs, after answer filed, to substantiate the allegation in their bill by proof, if they could, that the slaves in question were held by them as distributees, among others, of the estate of Henry Randolph, their father. As to the grounds on which relief ought to be afforded, in a case like this, I refer to my opinion in the case of Freeland v. Allen, 3 Rand. 170.

I think the Decree ought to be reversed, and the Injunction reinstated.

204 *Allison v. The President, Directors and Company of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia.

March, 1828.

Bond with Condition—Debt on—Declaration—Allegations.—In an action of debt on a bond conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of an office, the Declaration need not set forth the particular persons from whom money was received, nor the sums received from each, nor the time when the breaches were committed, if it appears that they occurred during the continuance of the Defendant in his office; nor is it necessary to state the damages occasioned by the breaches.

Banks—Accountant—Sureties—Liability.—The sureties of an Accountant of a Bank, are not liable for monies taken by him from the Teller's drawer, without his knowledge or consent, it appearing that the Accountant is not entrusted with, or put in possession of, any monies of the Bank, as Accountant.

Pleading and Practice—Declaration—Allegation of Injury.—It is not necessary for the Declaration, after the assignment of breaches, to allege that the Plaintiffs have been injured by the breaches; but, it is sufficient if it is stated that an action has accrued to the Plaintiffs to demand and have the penalty of the bond.

Bond with Penalty—Action on—Declaration—Allegations.—In an action for the penalty of a bond, it is

Bond with Condition—Debt on—Declaration—Allegations.—In an action on a bond with collateral conditions, when the bond provides for many things of different kinds to be done, the omission of any one of which would constitute a breach, it is usual and proper to specially assign breaches of each kind or class of such acts. But it is not necessary or even proper to set forth each single act or the several particular sums of money received constituting the breach, as such particularity would lead to too great prolixity. Wheeling v. Black, 25 W. Va. 274, citing the principal case to sustain the proposition. And in Elam v. Commercial Bank, 86 Va. 94, 9 S. E. Rep. 498, it is said: "In Allison v. Bank, 6 Rand. 204, the demurrer to a declaration in debt upon the bond of an accountant was overruled, although the declaration did not state in a single instance the time or place, names or sums, of the money which had been misappropriated. In cases of this character, where the evidence must of necessity be general, and an attempt to state the breaches of the condition with exactness of detail will lead to great prolixity of pleading, some generality of statement, in the interest of justice, must be permitted. 3 Rob. Pr. 593; 4 Minors' Inst. 584, 988."

To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Guarantee Co. v. Bank, 96 Va. 489, 23 S. E. Rep. 909; Kern v. Ziegler, 13 W. Va. 714; B. & O. R. Co. v. Jameson, 13 W. Va. 844.

See further, monographic note on "Bonds" appended to Ward v. Churn, 18 Gratt. 801.

The principal case is also cited in B. & O. R. Co. v. Bitner, 15 W. Va. 459; Reynolds v. Hurst, 18 W. Va. 660; Caldwell v. Farmers' Bank, 6 Rand. 241.

not necessary to state that in consequence of the refusal of the Defendant to pay, the Plaintiff sustained damage.

Felony—Bar to Civil Remedy.—The felony of one is not a bar to, or a suspension of, a civil remedy for the same act. Per GREEN, Judge.

These were two actions of debt, brought in the Superior Court of Law held in Petersburg, by the Farmers' Bank of Virginia, one against Allison, and the other against Caldwell who were co-obligors in a bond with Frayser, conditioned for the said Frayser's faithful performance of the duties of the office of Accountant in the said Bank. The two cases are similar in their circumstances, with only two exceptions which are mentioned in the opinions which follow.

In the case of Allison v. The Bank, the Declaration contains an assignment of breaches, in the words of the condition. It alleges, "that the said William Frayser has not faithfully performed the duties assigned him, or trust reposed in him, as Accountant of the said Office of Discount and Deposit of the Farmers' Bank, at Petersburg, and that the said William Frayser has not been of good behaviour in his said office of Accountant, 205 during his 'continuance therein.'"

The Declaration then proceeds to specify, and particularize, several instances of breach of the condition of the bond. To this Declaration, the Defendant filed two pleas in abatement, and also special demurrers, which related to supposed defects in the form thereof. These pleas and demurrers were overruled by the Court. At a subsequent day, the Defendant tendered three pleas. To the second and third, the Plaintiffs Counsel objected. The Court permitted the second to be filed, but rejected the third. The first plea was, conditions performed, on which issue was joined by the Plaintiffs. The second plea stated in substance, that the Cashier and Teller of the Bank, were the only officers entrusted with the care of the money, that it was their duty to take care of it, and that all the monies which Frayser purloined, or fraudulently withdrew from the said Bank, was money in the custody and charge of the Teller, or Cashier, with which Frayser as Accountant had nothing to do, that he was enabled to withdraw said money by the want of care and vigilance of said Cashier and Teller, and that as the acts done by said Frayser did not relate to, or concern, his office of Accountant, the Defendant, his security, was not responsible therefor. To this plea, a special replication was filed, stating in effect, that the various acts of misconduct imputed to Frayser, as constituting the breaches of the condition of his bond, were acts done in his character of Accountant, and were violations of his duties as such. On this replication, an issue was made up. The Jury found a special verdict, which, though very long, it is deemed best to insert at large. It is as follows:

"We of the Jury find, first, that according to the Bye-Laws, Rules, Regulations, and Usages of the said Farmers' Bank at its said Office of Discount and Deposit at Petersburg, there are, and were always, at and during the time the said Wm. Frayser was Accountant there, an officer called the Cashier, and an officer called the Teller, as well as the said officer called Accountant, to each of whom are, and were assigned, several and appropriate duties. It is, and was, the duty of the Cashier to superintend generally, the business to the said Office of Discount and Deposit, and to take care of, and safe-keep, all the monies of their said Bank, there, except that placed in the hands of the Teller, to answer the purposes of current business. It is, and was, the duty of the Teller to disburse and receive all monies paid out of, or into the said office of Discount and Deposit; for which purpose he receives originally, and retains in his care, and safe-keeping, a certain sum from the Cashier, and other sums from time to time as wanting, and if he should at any time in the course of business get more in his hands than wanting for current business, he pays such overplus to the Cashier, if required. It is, and was, the duty of the Accountant, to keep the books and accounts of the said Office of Discount and Deposit (in the manner hereinafter particularly explained,) and for that purpose, the Accountant always has access to the books pertaining to the Department, of all the other officers and clerks in the said Office of Discount and Deposit. It is, and was, usual at the said Office of Discount and Deposit, occasionally, in case of the sickness or necessary absence from the Bank, of any of the officers thereof, for another officer to perform the duties of such sick or absent officer. But, at and during all the time the said Frayser was the Accountant at the said Office of Discount and Deposit, he had always so much to do, in his own proper office, that he was never on such occasions, so substituted for other officers. It is, and was, usual, too, at the said Office of Discount and Deposit, when the Teller left the counter for a short time, and any person presented a check, for some other officer of the Bank to pay the same out of the Teller's cash-drawer, or the money on the counter. But it does not appear, that the said Frayser ever so acted for the Teller, though he may have had frequent opportunities of doing so, except in one instance, when he changed a fifty dollar note, at the Teller's counter, and from his cash-drawer.

207 "Secondly. We find, that by whatever means individuals procure money to be paid to their credit at the said office of Discount and Deposit of the said Bank, whether by loan from the Bank or deposit therein, the only mode of obtaining money, in consequence of such credit, is, and always has been, by drawing checks or orders, as creditors would on individuals for the same purposes (form only excepted;) and as to the manner in which such checks are, and always have been paid at the Bank, and the uniform course pursued in jarrying them to the debit of the drawers thereof on the books of the Bank, the manner and course are, and always have been, as follows: The Teller, or other officer acting for him, receives the checks so drawn, which checks are always considered as paid, whether they be received in payment of debts of any kind due at the Bank, or deposited to the credit of those who present them, or money be actually drawn upon them. As soon as the Teller receives such checks, he puts them on a small spindle, by him kept there for that purpose, and at the close of each day, all the checks he has received in any way during the day, are entered by him into a book called the "Teller's Check-book" without regard to alphabetical or other order. These checks having been thus entered on the Teller's Check-book, are not, by such entry, the commencement of an original charge against the drawers thereof, being entered there principally to ascertain the amount, and being there also particularly described, in order that if any error occurred, it may be corrected, on examination, when the checks came into the Accountant's hands. The checks having been entered on the Teller's Check-book, and then distributed in alphabetical drawers, kept for that purpose, from which drawers they are taken by the Accountant, and by him entered in alphabetical order in a book kept by him, called the "Accountant's Check-book;" and this is the original entry of the charge against the respective drawers of the checks, and from them he makes the charges against the drawers thereof respectively, posting the checks to the debits of the accounts of the respective drawers upon the ledger, the checks remaining exclusively in the possession of the Accountant, as vouchers against the drawers, until such time as the accounts of the drawers are settled with them; when the checks are returned to them by the Accountant, with a peculiar mark of cancellation, and by the drawers acquiescence in such settlements of their accounts, the correctness of the charges of their respective checks to their debits is acknowledged; it being the custom at the Bank to settle the accounts of individual dealers with it, at short periods, or when by them requested. And we find that the said William Frayser, Accountant of the said Bank at its said Office of Discount and Deposit, (during the time in the Declaration mentioned,) was a very skilful Accountant, and until his delinquency, hereinafter mentioned, was discovered, possessed, in the highest degree, the confidence of all the officers of the Bank there, both in his ability and integrity; and that the said Wm. Frayser, at and during all the time he was Accountant there, was remarkably particular in keeping fast-locked the drawer containing checks received by him, from the Teller in manner aforesaid, so that no other officer of the Bank there, could have access to them, without forcing the lock; and that it is the custom of the said Office of Discount and Deposit, for the Teller's drawer containing his cash to remain open during Bank hours, part of the cash laying on the counter for immediate use, and that every day on closing the Bank, he locks the same up in some place of security; and as to the checks above mentioned, it often happens in the course of business, that checks are drawn without date, and that checks, whether dated or not, are often presented many days after they are drawn, and that the same individual draws and presents many checks, and sometimes checks for the same amount, on the same day.

Thirdly. We find, as the manner of stating, keeping, and settling the cash account of the said Office of Discount and Deposit of the said Bank, the manner is, and always has been, as follows: The cash account is formed, by posting the items of receipts of the day, as appearing from the books pertaining to the receiving officers, collected therefrom by the Accountant, and aggregated into one sum, which is placed to the debit of cash; and thus the balance of the cash account is ascertained every day, by the Accountant, from the books, and seen to agree precisely with the amount of money, found by actual count in the possession of the Teller, positive ascertained losses or gain in receipting or disbursing (errors at the counter not connected with the books, and generally trivial,) excepted.

Fourthly. We find, that the said William Frayser, at and during the time he was the Accountant at the said Office of Discount and Deposit, availing himself of occasional and necessary absences of the Teller from his place at the counter, and of the confidence which the other officers there reposed to him, the said Frayser, did fraudulently and improperly, without the consent or knowledge of any other officer there, take from the Teller's cash-drawer, diverse sums of money, at different times, amounting to the sum of ten thousand three hundred dollars, and that he contrived to prevent any discovery or detection thereof, in the daily settlements made at the time by filing on the Teller's spindle, a check of some individual dealer in said Bank of the same amount with the sum so taken, which check had been in fact previously paid by the Teller, entered by him, and by the Accountant in their respective Check-books, debited from the latter to the individual drawer or drawers, and then fraudulently withdrawn by the said Accountant from its proper place in his own drawer, in order, by placing it a second time on the Teller's spindle as a new check, to conceal the fraudulent taking of its amount, by the said Frayser as aforesaid; and then the said Accountant omitted again to debit the individual drawer or drawers of such check or checks in the ledger, with the amount thereof, although the same were regularly entered on both the said Check-books; because, if he had so debited them, the drawers would have detected him, by showing that they were twice charged for the same check. And we do also find, that many of the entries in the Teller's Check-book were made in the handwriting of the said Frayser, and that the hole made by the Teller's spindle in a check filed thereon is very small, so that by a little pressure it could be easily concealed from view, and in the hurry of business, it would be extremely difficult for the Teller to discover the spindle hole in a check since paid and put upon the spindle, and presented to him for payment a second time.

Fifthly. We find, the said Frayser at, and during the time he was Accountant at the said Office of Discount and Deposit, did fraudulently and improperly, without the consent or knowledge of any other officer of the Bank there, take from the Teller's cash-drawers divers sums, at different times, amounting to another sum of eight thousand eight hundred dollars, by the like fraudulent use of checks, which had been previously paid in the regular way, and been confided to him as Accountant and which he placed on the Teller's spindle as before stated, in order to conceal from that officer the mode of taking the said sums; and that the said Frayser, without entering these last mentioned checks in the Accountant's Check-book, contrived, by forcing the addition of such checks as were properly entered therein, and by carrying a false amount into the daily settlements of the cash account, or balance book, and by making a false subtraction of the amount of checks, to prevent a discovery, in the daily settlements made at the time, of the fact of the sums last above mentioned having been taken from the Teller's drawer.

Sixthly. We find, that the said Frayser, at and during the time he was Accountant as aforesaid, finding that the Teller had erroneously added up the checks on his, the Teller's Check-books, so as to make the amount too much by the sum of $2,200, did improperly conceal the fact of such mistake by false and fraudulent entries on the account book, and did fraudulently and improperly, without the consent or knowledge of any other officer of the Bank there, take from the Teller's cash-drawer the said sum of $2,200.

Seventhly. We find, that the said William Frayser, at and during the time he was Accountant at the said Office of Discount and Deposit, did fraudulently and improperly, and without the consent or knowledge of any other officer of the Bank there, take from the Teller's cash-drawer the further sum of $1,000, and that the said Frayser concealed the same by entering in the Teller's Check-book, at the bottom of the list of the day's checks, a check of one of the dealers of the Bank, for the like sum of $1,000, when in fact no such check had been drawn or paid; and, without debiting the individual dealer with such pretended check, the said Frayser continued by other false entries in his, the Accountant's books, to conceal the said fact.

Eighthly. We find, that the said Frayser, at and during the time he was Accountant at the said Office of discount and Deposit, did fraudulently and improperly, without the consent or knowledge of any other officer of the Bank there, take from the Teller's cash-drawer, the further sum of $200, and that he concealed the same by prefixing the figure 2 in the Teller's Check-book to a check of one of the dealers in the said Bank for $60, so as to make the sum appear in that book as a check for $260, instead of $60 only; and then, while the individual dealer was debited with the said sum of 60 dollars only, the said Frayser contrived, by other false entries in his, the Accountant's books, further to conceal the said fact.

Ninthly. We find, that all the sums of money mentioned in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings, herein before contained, were wholly lost to the said Bank, by reason of the said Frayser obtaining the same from the Teller's cash-drawer, in manner stated in our said findings; and that he, the said Frayser, was enabled to obtain the *same by the fraudulent and improper use of checks in his possession as Accountant, as aforesaid, and to conceal the same by false and fraudulent entries and omissions in the books, in the manner above stated. But, we find that nothing is due to the said Office of Discount and Deposit of the said Bank from those individual dealers with the Bank, whose checks were used a second time by the said Frayser, in the manner described in our said several findings, herein before contained; nor have those individual dealers with the Bank, whose checks have been used, or whose accounts have been falsified, in the manner herein before stated, gained from the Bank in consequence thereof, any monies to which they were not justly entitled.

Tenthly. We find, that the said Frayser was not, at any time while he was the Accountant at the said Office of Discount and Deposit, nor in any wise by virtue of his said office of Accountant, or by the Regulations or Usages of the said Bank there, entrusted with or put in possession of, the monies kept in the Teller's cash-drawer, or of any other money of the Bank at its said Office, or entrusted with the safe-keeping, receipt, or disbursement of such monies; and that the said Frayser fraudulently and improperly, and without the consent or knowledge of any other officer of the Bank there, took and carried away, from the Teller's cash-drawer, and to his own use converted, the said several sums of money, in our said 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings, above mentioned, and also concealed such taking and carrying away, in the manner in our said finding stated, with intent, at the time and times at which he so took and carried away the said monies, so to convert them to his own use, and well knowing that he had no right to take and convert them.

Eleventhly. We find, that the said Frayser commenced committing the several malfeasances and nonfeasances hereinabove mentioned, and continued in the practice of them from the 20th day of January, 1816, till the 31st day of December, 1819, without detection; and that, 213 *on the 3d day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty, he absconded from the town of Petersburg aforesaid; and that he returned to the town of Petersburg aforesaid, on the 11th of January, 1820, after his delinquency had been discovered, and the fact of his being in Petersburg was known, yet he was not apprehended, or prosecuted, criminally or otherwise, and no attempt was made to apprehend or prosecute him.

Twelfthly. We find, it was a duty of the said Frayser, at and during the time he was Accountant at the said Office of Discount and Deposit, and a duty pertaining to his office of Accountant aforesaid, to communicate to the Cashier, every instance of individual dealers with the said Bank, there, overdrawing on the Bank; and that, in two instances, dealers with the said Bank did overdraw to a considerable amount, and that the said Frayser, instead of communicating the first overdrawing to the Cashier, according to his official duty, made one of the accounts balance on the books, by bringing forward a false balance on the ledger, kept by him, and the other, by prefixing figures to sums credited, so as to make them more than they ought rightly to have been; and that one of the said accounts, in which there was such overdrawing, has been since settled by the individual dealer with the Bank, and the balance paid by him thereto, except interest, (which interest, however, the Plaintiffs now here at the bar waive any claim for, in this action;) and that, on account of the other dealer so overdrawing, there is still a balance of $1,498 26, due to the Bank, and that that sum is lost to the Plaintiffs.

Thirteenth. We find, that at and during the time the said Frayser was Accountant at the said office of Discount and Deposit there was a loss which accrued to the Bank, in consequence of his failure to perform the duties of his office, (as is now here at the bar acknowledged by the Defendant,) to the amount of $1,317 6.

Fourteenth. We find, that the said Frayser borrowed of a certain Watkins, Boisseau & Co. their check on the said 214 *Office of Discount and Deposit for the sum of $300, and that he stated to them at the time of borrowing it, that he did not know whether he would use it or not; that the said Frayser in fact presented and obtained payment of the said check, which was afterwards entered on both the Teller's and Accountant's Check-books; but, the said Frayser omitted to debit on the books of the said Bank the said Watkins, Boisseau & Co. with the amount of the check so paid, and fraudulently withdrew the check, and returned the same to the said Watkins, Boisseau & Co. as a check which had not been used, whereby the sum of $300 was lost to the Plaintiffs.

Fifteenth. We find, by consent of parties as to the form of finding in this particular, all the Acts of Assembly relating to the Farmers' Bank, and all the By-Laws, Rules and Regulations of the said Bank, to be taken as part of the record, without being spread upon it, by reference thereto. But, upon the facts above stated, we, of the Jury, doubt, and pray the advice of the Court; and, if upon the whole case, the Court is of opinion, that the Defendant is liable to the Plaintiffs to the amount of $10,000, then we find for the Plaintiffs the debt in the Declaration mentioned; and, if the Court shall be of opinion, that the Defendant is liable for a less sum than $10,000, then we find for the Plaintiffs the debt in the Declaration mentioned, to be discharged by the payment of such sum as the Court shall hold the Defendant liable for, upon the facts stated, with interest from the 1st day of January, in the year 1818, till paid, so as such sum, with interest, exceed not $10,000; the parties in open Court consenting to the form of finding in this particular."

At a subsequent day, to wit: Monday, the 28th of May, 1821, the Court having heard an argument, and thereupon, the matters of Law arising upon the special verdict in this case being considered, it seemed to the Court that the Law was for the Plaintiffs: it was therefore adjudged by the Court, that the Plaintiffs recover against 215 the Defendant, "ten thousand dollars, the debt in the Declaration mentioned, and the costs in this behalf expended.

Subjoined to the Judgment is a note, stating, that this cause came on to be heard, together with another case, brought by same Plaintiffs, against Joseph Caldwell, on the same special verdict, and the Court, without affecting the right of the Plaintiffs to several executions on the Judgments aforesaid, doth order, that the Sergeant or other Officer, to whom such execution may issue, shall cause satisfaction to be made of the said sum of ten thousand dollars, only, on both Judgments, and the costs in both suits, which were founded upon the same writing obligatory.

From the Judgment in this cause, Allison, the Defendant, appealed to the Court of Appeals.

March 27. JUDGE CARR.

In this case, I had written a long and laboured opinion, some time ago, which, on recent discussions with my brethren, I am induced to think was wrong in the main. I have, therefore, abandoned it, and shall content myself with a few brief remarks, referring generally to the opinions of my brothers Cabell and Coalter, which, in my mind, take a correct view of the case.

The Declaration was specially demurred to, because the breaches were not set out with sufficient minuteness; and it was insisted in the argument, that the amount of each particular sum, withdrawn by the Teller at each particular time, should have been specially stated. I think the breaches were well assigned, both upon the English and American cases; and I refer to Strum v. Farrington, 1 Bos. & Pull. 160; Barton v. Webb, 8 Term Rep. 459; Carlin v. Chalklin, 3 Mau. & Selw. 502; Craghill v. 216 *Page, 2 Hen. & Munf. 446; Winslow v. Commonwealth, Ibid. 459.

Upon the special verdict, it is clear, (and indeed, was admitted,) that the Appellant is responsible for the sums comprised in the 12th, 13th and 14th findings of the Jury; these being direct and clear breaches of Frayser's official bond. The great controversy was upon the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings; and as to these, the Counsel for the Appellant contended, that he, as surety for Frayser, bound himself only that Frayser should faithfully perform the duties assigned to, or trust reposed in him, as Accountant; not that he should commit no felony; that the takings stated in the 4th, &c. findings, were not connected with the duties of an Accountant, as expressly found by the Jury; but were pure and simple felonies, committed by Frayser, in stealing the money from the Teller's drawer: that, therefore, the Appellant was not liable for these monies, first, because the takings were no breaches of the bond; secondly, because, if they were breaches, they were felonies, and the felony merged the trespass, so far at least, that no civil action could be maintained, till the felony was prosecuted to conviction or acquittal. On this last point, (though I have examined it much, and at one time though the case turned on it,) I shall say not a word, because I am now satisfied that it does not fairly arise, as the first question disposes of all these findings. After stating in the 4th, &c. findings, the manner in which Frayser took and concealed the various sums contained in those findings, the Jury, in their 10th finding, say, "We find that the said Frayser was not, at any time while he was Accountant at the said Office of Discount and Deposit, nor in any wise by his said office of Accountant, or by the regulations or usages of the said Bank there, entrusted with, or put in possession of, the monies kept in the Teller's cash drawer, or of any other money of the Bank at its said office, or entrusted with the safe keeping, receipt, or disbursement of such monies; and that the said Frayser 217 *fraudulently and improperly, and without the consent of any other officer of the Bank there, took and carried away from the Teller's cash-drawer, and to his own use converted, the said several sums of money in our 4th, &c. findings, mentioned; and also concealed such taking and carrying away, in the manner in our said findings stated, with intent, at the time and times at which he so took and carried away the said monies, to convert them to his own use, and well knowing that he had no right to take and convert them." If there be a single ingredient necessary to the composition of larceny, not found here, I confess that I have strangely mistaken the matter. It is found, too, that this larceny was wholly unconnected with the office of Accountant: that, as Accountant, Frayser had nothing to do with the money of the Bank in any way. Was stealing within the bond? Was it to guard against a felony of this kind, (or any felony,) that the bond was taken? Could Allison, when he signed the bond, intend to bind himself, that Frayser should not steal? No more, I conceive, than that he should not commit any other felony.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that so far as relates to these findings, the Judgment be reversed, and entered for the amount of the 12th, 13th, and 14th findings, with interest from the 1st of January 1818, till paid.

JUDGE GREEN.

This is an action upon a bond executed by an officer of the Bank and his sureties, with condition faithfully to perform the duties assigned to, or trust reposed in him, as Accountant, and to be of good behaviour in office, so long as he continued therein. The Declaration sets out the condition of the bond, and assigns various breaches: 1. In availing himself of his office, fraudulently to withdraw and appropriate to his own use, divers large sums of money belonging to the Bank. 2. In fraudulently keeping the books of the Bank, and fraudulently omitting 218 proper entries *therein, whereby he himself fraudulently got and obtained, and others fraudulently got and obtained and appropriated to their own use, divers other large sums of money belonging to the Bank. 3. In permitting fraudulently, and by the fraudulent keeping of the books, divers persons to over-check, and thereby obtain other large sums of money from the Bank, to which they were not entitled. 4. In failing to post charges, and enter as debits to any person or persons, divers large sums of money paid by the Bank upon checks presented by him and many other persons; by which means, he and others fraudulently withdrew other large sums of money from the Bank. 5. In fraudulently making divers false entries and untrue credits on the books, and fraudulently entering divers large sums of money to the credit of divers persons, which were never deposited or paid by such persons; thereby making them appear to be creditors of, whilst they were debtors to, the Bank.

To this Declaration, a special demurrer was filed, assigning for causes of demurrer, that the Declaration claimed no damages, and that the assignment of breaches was too general; not stating, in any single instance, time or place, names or sums of money.

I do not think, that in an action upon a bond with collateral condition, it is necessary to state, in the conclusion of the Declaration, the amount of damages sustained; for, if it be stated, the Plaintiff, in such cases, can recover more damages than are laid in the Declaration. Yet in all cases, there ought to be an averment in the Declaration, that the Plaintiff sustained some damage, by reason of the facts upon which the action is founded. In the cases in this Court, in which it has been held that no damages need be stated in an action of debt, although the amount of damages was not stated, yet it was averred that the Plaintiff had sustained damage; and in these cases, there were verdicts. In all the Books, it is laid down, that every Declaration, (except in a qui tam action) must conclude with an allegation that the 219 *Plaintiff has sustained damage; though I cannot find any case, in which the failure to make that allegation, was held to be fatal upon demurrer. Indeed, there is no case reported, in which the question arose. It is probable, that no English Pleader ever omitted this averment in the Declaration. There is in this Declaration, no intimation that any acts or omissions of the Accountant, or the failure to pay the penalty of the bond, produced any damage to the Plaintiffs. But, in the place where this latter averment ought to have been made, we find an averment that the principal obligee had absconded.

The Declaration in the case of Allison v. The Bank,* is precisely the same as in this, except that after setting out the breaches, it alleges that the Plaintiffs have been greatly injured thereby, by reason whereof, an action hath accrued to them to demand the penalty of the bond, and concludes "to the damage of the Plaintiffs $10,000;" and to that Declaration, there is a special demurrer, as in this case. Besides the objection in Caldwell's Case that no damages are alleged as being sustained by the Plaintiff, the objections that no time when, nor place where, the several acts alleged to be breaches of the condition of the bond were done, are stated, nor any specific sum or sums of money are alleged to have been taken by Frayser, or lost by his negligence, are common to both Declarations. I think these objections are well founded. There ought, in all pleadings, to be a reasonable degree of certainty. The time when the acts complained of were done, ought, I think, to have been stated, in order to show that they were done after the execution of the bond, and before the institution of the suit, and during the continuance of the principal obligor in office; and the sums taken, ought to have been stated in detail, or in the aggregate; and it should have been alleged, that they were lost to the Plaintiffs, by reason of the fraudulently making false, or omitting *to make true, entries, or other acts done in breach of his duty. When the particular statement of all circumstances would lead to great prolixity, as in this case, a more general mode of pleading is allowable than in ordinary cases. Strum v. Farrington, 1 Bos. & Pull. 640; Barton v. Webb, 8 Term Rep. 459. See the later case of Deniston v. Richardson, 14 East, 291. But, this is allowed only to avoid prolixity and voluminous pleading; but surely, this indulgence to necessity or convenience, does not dispense with that degree of certainty, of which the pleadings are susceptible without prolixity. If, in fact, the breach of the condition of the bond had consisted in one false entry, and the loss thereby, of one single sum of money taken by the Book-keeper or any other; it would not have been sufficient, upon a special demurrer, to allege in the Declaration, that a sum of money was lost, by reason of a false entry, without stating time, place, name and sum. For, in that case, the motive to avoid prolixity would not exist. And so in these cases, it would not have increased the volume of the pleadings, or produced any inconvenience, to allege that divers sums of money, to the amount of $20,000, were taken and lost, by reason of divers false entries, &c. to the Plaintiffs, after the execution of the bond, and before the institution of the suit, and whilst the principal obligor remained in office, to wit, on the day of at the County aforesaid. I think, upon this ground, the Declarations are insufficient. My brother Judges, however, differing with me in this, I proceed to examine the cause upon its merits.

It is admitted, that the sums of money amounting to $3,115 32 cents, mentioned in the 12th, 13th, and 14th findings of the Jury, are properly chargeable on the Book-keeper's sureties; but, as to those mentioned in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings, amounting to upwards of $20,000, it is contended, that they are not recoverable in this action, because the sums of money lost to the Bank, in the manner stated in those findings, were not 221 lost in "consequence of any official misconduct of the Book-keeper; and if they were, that they cannot be recovered against his sureties, as they could not be recovered against him, since his acts, in taking those sums of money, were felonious, (as they certainly were,) and he has not been prosecuted for the felony. These several findings state, in effect, that the Book-keeper, from time to time, during several years, took clandestinely from the cash-drawer, various sums of money, not entrusted to his care or keeping, and successfully concealed the facts, by the fraudulent use of the paid checks confided to him as Book-keeper, and by making false, and omitting to make true, entries, knowingly and for that purpose, and by forcing additions in the books kept by him; and in the 9th finding, the Jury say "We find that all the said sums of money mentioned in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings, where wholly lost to the said Bank, by reason of the said Frayser obtaining the same from the Teller's cash-drawer, in the manner stated in our said findings; and, that he, the said Frayser, was enabled to obtain the same by the fraudulent and improper use of the checks in his possession as Accountant as aforesaid, and to conceal the same by false and fraudulent entries and omissions in the books in the manner aforesaid." This declaration of the Jury, that Frayser was enabled to obtain money, by the fraudulent use of the checks, and concealed the fact by false entries, applies only to the sum found to be taken, in the 4th finding. But, that sum amounts to more than the penalty of the bond; and if his sureties are liable for that, it is unnecessary to enquire as to any others. This fraudulent and improper use of the checks confided to him, and the intentionally making of false, and omitting to make true, entries, were per se breaches of the condition of the bond; and the Plaintiffs were, for that only, entitled to recover the penalty of the bond, to be discharged by nominal damages, and such other as might afterwards accrue, by reason of future breaches; and if any real damage was the 222 consequence "of those acts done in breach of the condition, they were entitled to recover them, no matter whether these consequences were direct or indirect, so that they could be distinctly traced to that cause, and to no other. Whether the loss of the money was really a consequence of those acts, was purely a question of fact belonging to the Jury exclusively; and I think they have distinctly found, and intended to find, that the loss was the consequence of the taking and concealment, and that he was enabled to take and conceal, by means of acts in violation of the condition of the bond. If, upon the other facts specially found, the Court, if in the place of the Jury, would have made a contrary inference, that would be the proper ground for a new trial, and would not justify the Court in declaring the fact to be contrary to the verdict, and thereupon pronouncing a final Judgment. I think, not only that the Court is bound by the verdict, but that the Jury, in finding thus, did not indulge any rash or unfounded presumption. It cannot be said, that the loss could not possibly be the consequence of those acts; or, even that it probably was not. The Jury state the manner of keeping and examining the books daily; from which it is clear, that there was a moral certainty that if the books had been truly kept, the taking would have been immediately discovered; and that might, and probably would, have led to the detection of the thief, the recovery of the money, and the prevention of any future losses by the same means. The possibility that the taking might not have been detected, or if detected, traced to Frayser, or, if traced to him, the money might not have been regained by reason of his flight, or any other imaginable cause, can hardly be considered as decisively outweighing the contrary probabilities. Suppose it to be the duty of the Book-keeper, to give immediate notice to the Cashier, if he should discover it in inspecting the books, that some one had overdrawn, and the money was lost to the Bank, would it be any defence to say, or even to prove, that the person who had got the money, might 223 have, or did "in fact, fly the Country, or might have been, or was in fact, insolvent, before the money could have been recovered of him, if the Accountant had done his duty? I think not. One who flies, may if promptly pursued, be retaken even in a Foreign Country, and the money regained; and one who is insolvent may pay, by means of his friends, to avoid imprisonment or disgrace. Depriving the Bank of a chance, however small, of indemnifying themselves, and by an act violating his official duty, I think subjects the Accountant and his sureties to a responsibility, which can only be measured by the full amount of the money taken and lost.

Upon the question, whether the felony of the principal is a bar to, or a suspension until he is prosecuted criminally, of the action on his bond, I have no doubt. I have examined with great care the English doctrine on this subject, from its origin to the present time. But, as this case is not to turn on that point, I shall not state at large the grounds of the opinion that I have formed, but confine myself to a mere summary of the result of my enquiries and reflections upon it.

We find no trace of any thing like this doctrine in the Books of the Common Law, before the time of Hen. 6; but, on the contrary, Bracton, who wrote in the time of Hen. 3, lays it down, that a party injured by a felony, may seek redress by a civil action, or an appeal of felony, which was a criminal prosecution, at his election. Book 3, ch. 3, sec. 1. And to the same effect is Fleta, Book 1, ch. 38, sec. 1, and Book 2, ch. 2, sec. 5; a Book written in the time of Edw. 2, or Edw. 3, according to Lord Coke. Proem to 10 Rep. or of Edw. 1, according to Selden in his edition of Fleta, page 547. And in the 44th Edw. 3, Ass. 44, 13, Judgment was given for the Plaintiff in an action of trespass against several for the ravishment of his wife, and taking away his goods; which was a felony at the Common Law, and was then also a felony by the Statute of West. 2; 2 Inst. 434; 224 20 Vin. Abr. 467, *X. 4, Pl. 1. There is not a single adjudged case reported to this day, in which a civil action founded on a wrong amounting to a felony, has been adjudged not to lie. On the contrary, Judgments have been given for the Plaintiffs in many such cases, where the felon has been prosecuted and acquitted or convicted, and even where he has not been prosecuted criminally. The whole doctrine on this subject in England, rests upon the dicta of the Judges thrown out arguendo, and assuming various grounds as the foundation of the rule. The first of these dicta is to be found in the case reported in the Year Book 31 Edw. 6, Pl. 6. That was a Writ of Conspiracy against several, for that they had indicted the Plaintiff of an assault upon B., and beating and wounding him, &c., and feloniously stealing from his purse four shillings, of which he was acquitted. An objection was taken to the action, that it did not lie for a conspiracy in indicting the Plaintiff of an assault, battery and wounding. To this it was answered, that all those matters being contained in one Indictment, an acquittal of the felony was an acquittal of the trespass "quia magis dignum trahit ad se minus dignum," and "felony is of a higher nature than trespass," and "if one come to my house to rob me, and breaks my house, and takes the goods or not, the robbery and breaking of the house are one felony; and if he be acquitted of the felony, he is acquitted of the trespass also." Brooke, in abridging this case, says, "It was agreed that if a man be indicted, arraigned, and acquitted of robbery of J. S., he shall not thereof have trespass; for, the trespass is extinct in the felony, and omne majus trahit ad se minus. Quære inde." This is the origin of the rule, founded upon the doctrine of merger, and a mere dictum; and it had, if true, the effect of barring the civil action for the tort, under all possible circumstances. Yet, this doctrine was abandoned in the first case which occurred, of an action brought after a conviction of the Defendant upon an indictment; "because (as it was said) the party had 225 thereby 'lost his remedy by appeal;' and so it has been held, that the civil action lies after an acquittal on an Indictment; thus shifting the foundation of the rule from the ground that the trespass itself was merged and lost in the felony, to the other, that the inferior remedy by a civil action was merged in the superior remedy by appeal, (which was a criminal prosecution,) and allowing that when the higher remedy was lost, the inferior remedy revived. And in modern times, the Judges, admitting the existence of the rule, have abandoned this latter ground also, and placed it upon the broad footing of public policy, and the interests of the public in encouraging and coercing individuals to engage in the prosecution of crimes. Indeed, there seems to be good reason for the doctrine of modern times upon this subject, in England. It is in conformity with the severe spirit of their Laws, in respect to the prosecution and punishment of crimes, which has always urged individuals, by various inducements, to the prosecution of crimes; by the forfeiture of the stolen property to the King, in case of a conviction without the intervention of the party, and fresh suit on his part; or to the Lord of the manor, when the property is waived by the felon and seized as waif; enlisting the passions of private revenge, by allowing an appeal at the suit of the party, in which, if there was a conviction, the King could not pardon; by making the Hundred liable, if the party made fresh suit, and hue and cry, and the felon was not arrested; but not otherwise. In all these respects, the policy and spirit of our Laws are the reverse of those of the English Laws. We have no appeal, in which the right to a civil action can merge. We have no forfeiture to the public, of the stolen goods or even of those of the felon; no fresh suit, or active prosecution, on the part of the injured person, is required by our Laws, to entitle him to restitution. We have no Law of waifs, nor any subjecting the Hundred to make satisfaction in any case; and our Law, upon the whole rather discourages than in- 226 vites individual prosecutions. "And

I am persuaded that the object of promoting the prosecution of crimes, would be more promoted by allowing the injured individual to prosecute his civil action uninterruptedly, and thus expose all the circumstances of the transaction to the Officers of the Law, who are bound ex officio to prosecute for the public, than by holding out strong inducement to both parties, to compound the felony, by throwing impediments in the way of the civil remedy.

The rule in question has never been practically extended, or distinctly declared to extend, to any case, in which the suit was not against the felon himself, and founded on the felonious act, as the gist of the action; nor to third persons guilty of no crime, nor to any action founded on contracts.

I think, that upon the merits, the Judgments in these cases were right.

JUDGE COALTER.

The first question in these cases arises on the demurrers to the Declarations. I have some doubts on this question; but, on the whole, am inclined to support the Declarations.

This is an action of debt for the penalty of the bond, which is one with collateral condition for the faithful discharge, by the principal obligor, of his duties as Accountant in the Bank. They are several actions against each surety, for the sum in which they became jointly and severally bound with their principal.

There are two ways of declaring; one, simply in debt on the bond, in which case, if the Defendant craves oyer of the condition, and pleads performance, the Plaintiff must reply and set out the breaches; or, if it goes to a Writ of Enquiry without plea, the Plaintiff must assign his breaches, &c. The Judgment is for the debt sued for, to be discharged by the damages found on the breaches assigned; and the Judgment will stand as security 227 for any breaches "thereafter, which may be recovered on a Scire Facias setting out new breaches. This is by virtue of the Act of Assembly (1 Revised Code, 509;) before which, only one breach could be assigned, as the assignment of more would be duplicity; and however small that breach, the whole penalty was recovered, and the party was driven into a Court of Equity, to be relieved against the penalty. The other mode of declaring, is, to set out the condition in the Declaration, and assign the breaches in it. This latter mode has been pursued in this case.

There is no question, that an assignment of breaches against the sureties need not be more specific, than if assigned in a Declaration against the principal, (Barton v.
Webb, 8 Term Rep. 459;) and the question is, whether it is sufficient to say, after setting out the particular manner in which the principal violated his duty in each particular case of loss, that thereby divers large sums, &c. were lost, without setting out in detail each particular sum. It seems that if, after the words "divers large sums," the Declaration had gone on to state, "amounting to the sum of $1,000," or any other gross sum, it would have been sufficient; though the Plaintiff would not be bound to prove that identical sum to have been lost. This shows that the particular sum is not traversable, or necessary to be known, in order to enable the party to defend himself; and it would, therefore, seem to me to be strange, that this should be a cause of demurrer. The acts of violation of duty, it seems to me, are sufficiently stated, to apprise the party of the grounds on which a recovery is sought; and as the action is for the penalty, and for a debt which has accrued by reason of a breach of the condition, and which must be recovered in debt, if any breach, however small, is proved, damages on the amount of that breach need not be laid in the Declaration.
The damage, if any, which is to be laid in the Declaration, is damage for the non-payment of the debt; and although in general, this is but nominal, yet it is the usual form of declaring, to claim damages;

228 and as "the forms of the Law are often proof of the Law, it is said that the Declaration, which in one of these cases, does not claim such damages, is bad. I am not prepared to say, that in the general, this would not be a good cause of demurrer; though it would seem strange that the omission to claim what at most would justify the verdict and Judgment for one cent damages, and that against the demurrant who gets clear even of that because it is not claimed, should be insisted on by him as a ground of demurrer. He could only so insist upon it, on the ground that for want of this, no cause of action is laid in the Declaration. But the debt, which he owes by reason of a breach of the condition, is the substantial cause of action.
But, the party will be excused for not claiming damages for the failure to pay a debt, I presume, wherever it would be error to give Judgment for damages, if claimed. There are many cases in which it is error to give such Judgment; as, in qui tam actions, and in actions popular on penal Statutes, and Judgments on Scire Facias. Frederick v. Lookup, 4 Burr.

2018; Cuming v. Sibley, Ibid. 2489. This would seem to me to be much a case of this kind. The sureties here are responsible no further than for the penalty of the bond; though their principal is responsible for the whole loss. They are strangers to the breach, and cannot know that such breach has taken place until it is so adjudged; and of course, cannot fairly be said wrongfully to have detained a debt, nor could any thing, except what would, at most, be purely nominal, be recovered against them for damages. They would not be liable for interest on the penalty, by way of damages, from the time of the breach. The first breach may be small, and yet the penalty is thereby forfeited. Besides, the act itself would seem to exclude it. If the breaches sued for do not cover the whole penalty, and that can only be ascertained by the verdict, the Judgment for the penalty stands as a security for after breaches. For these, however, no Judgment can be had on the Scire Facias, beyond the penalty. No Judgment can 229 be given "for damages, for not paying the debt, when the whole shall have become due, for these after breaches.

As to the merits. It seems to me, that the great question in controversy in these cases, rests on the first breach assigned, and the verdict in relation to it. It avers, that William Frayser, the principal obligor, did not faithfully perform the duties assigned to him, or the trust reposed in him as Accountant, and was not of good behaviour in his said office of Accountant, particularly in this, that whilst acting as Accountant, he availed himself of the said office of Accountant, fraudulently to withdraw, and did fraudulently withdraw from the said office, &c. and appropriate to his own use, divers large sums of money belonging to the said Bank.

It is not pretended, I presume, that the first branch of this assignment, in the words of the condition, had it stopped there, would have been a good assignment of a breach in a case like the present; and I understand it as merely preliminary to the specific assignments afterwards set out, in the same manner as if repeated before each. This specific breach, then, unless it can be construed to mean that the fraudulent taking was perpetrated in the course of the fulfilment of the duties assigned, and the trust reposed in him as Accountant, could have been supported by evidence simply proving, that whilst acting as Accountant, he availed himself of his contiguous stand to the Teller, or his drawer, and had taken from the pocket of the Teller, or from his drawer, monies belonging to the Bank. This would be a simple felony, which a dealer in the Bank, admitted behind the counter, or which a servant in the Bank, so admitted, might be guilty of, owing to the advantage of his situation so obtained. Had the breach been thus broad, or if it can be so considered, it seems to be that it would be substantially bad, and would be reached by the demurrer.

But, it is connected with the actings of Frayser in his office, not only by the general allegation preceding it, that 230 *he had violated the duties of his office, but it connects the act done with his acting, at the time it was done, as Accountant, "whilst acting as Accountant;" and it lays it as a fraudulent abduction of the money, not a felonious taking, or such a taking as the preceding statement would show to be a felonious taking. It is laid to be a taking connected with his duty and trust as Accountant, and so only a breach of trust. It might have been so. It might have been a duty assigned to him, to pay and receive money in the absence of the Teller; and so he would have been entrusted with the money. Had the breach been simply, that being Accountant, and entitled to stand behind the counter, and near the Teller's drawer, he had availed himself of that position to steal the money of the Bank from the drawer, then the question would have been, whether such breach would be good, either on demurrer, or after verdict, to charge the surety?

The Defendant's second plea intended to put this matter of fact in issue; that is, to aver that the taking was not connected with his duties or trust as Accountant, and was a mere fraudulent taking, of which any other man might have been guilty, and so the surety not liable. The replication to this plea, as I understand it, denies this, and affirms, that the damage sustained was by reason of the nonfeasance, malfeasance, and misbehaviour of the said William Frayser, in his office of Accountant, as the Plaintiffs in declaring have alleged. Had the Plaintiffs demurred to this plea, thereby admitting that the loss sustained was by means of a felonious stealing by the Accountant, but that nevertheless the sureties were liable as fully as the thief himself was, that question of Law would have been thus fairly before the Court. But, the case is not rested on that. The taking is insisted on as a mere fraudulent breach of that trust and confidence reposed in him as Accountant, and for the faithful discharge of which he gave the bond sued on.

231 *The Jury, in their first finding, negative the idea that Frayser ever acted for, or performed the duties of, the Teller, in his absence from indisposition, or in any short or occasional absence; and in the 10th finding, it is stated, that he was in no wise by virtue of his office, or by the regulations or usages of the Bank, entrusted with, or put in possession of, the monies kept in the Teller's cash-drawer, or with the safe-keeping, receipt, or disbursement of monies; and that he fraudulently and improperly, and without the consent or knowledge of any other officer of the Bank, took and carried away from the Teller's cash-drawer, and to his own use converted, the said several sums of money, in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings; and also concealed such taking in the manner in said finding stated, with intent to convert them, and well knowing he had no right to take and convert them. In other words, they find a felonious stealing and carrying away, setting out all the means of concealment, &c. which accompanied the various acts of felony. This is the substance of the finding, taking it all together.

Suppose the means of concealment had not proved quite so good, but that the Cashier had, within an hour after the first transaction, or the next day, taken the trouble to compare the books, &c.; and the Accountant, seeing he must be discovered, had absconded with the money; would his surety have been responsible? Suppose he had simply stolen the money, and resorted to any other mode of concealment which his stand in the Bank enabled him to use. As for instance; suppose the Teller, missing the money, and suspecting some one else, had consulted the Accountant, and he, under the pretence of finding the felon, had agreed with the Teller to conceal the matter for a short time, by forcing the books, &c.; but, in the mean time, finding suspicions attach to himself, he makes his escape with the money; would this artifice, and the use of his books for this purpose, although it might have shielded him from immediate detection, have been sufficient to charge his 232 surety, "if they were not chargeable at the moment he stole the money?"

That act, if the money was never returned to the drawer, is the act which caused the injury. The means of concealment may be more or less efficacious, according to the credit and high standing of the officer committing the felony, or the influence of the other officers. The various acts of felony, and the means used, and the length of time they are concealed, it seems to me, cannot vary the Law of the case. Notwithstanding the means resorted to here, the first felony might have been discovered within two minutes after it was perpetrated. Suppose a dealer had come in, and presented his check, and the Teller had told him, "You had only $1,000 in Bank; you checked on yesterday for $500, and on today for $500 more;" and he had denied the latter. In the mean time, the Accountant, knowing what is to follow, makes his escape with the money. Would the sureties have been liable? If, instead of stealing the money, he had presented the check a second time, or caused it to be presented, and has thus gotten the money, it would have been another matter. The act, by which the money is lost to the Bank, is a simple act of stealing, which any one might commit; and the question is, must the sureties in the bond answer? I think not. Suppose he had given no security, but had executed his sole bond, binding his heirs, &c., and there had been no other claim against him, except that arising out of his felonious taking: Could he have been sued on the bond for it? Suppose the truth of the case to be set out in the Declaration; would it not be debt and trespass united? It seems to me it would. Suppose he had died before suit; would this have ranked against his executor as a debt due by bond, or as for goods taken by the testator, and converted, &c.? If he had left no personal estate but had been detected a few minutes after the felony, and had cut his throat, could a suit have been maintained on the bond, against his heir or his sureties? Or, suppose the Plaintiffs had taken and prosecuted him for 233 *the felony, and he was now in the Penitentiary, as he ought to be, according to this finding of the Jury; would the action lie for the goods so feloniously stolen, against the surety? Suppose the Declaration, instead of alleging that he had escaped, had stated that he had been taken, prosecuted, and was now in the Penitentiary, and so the Plaintiffs had a right to demand and have the penalty from the sureties; could the Declaration have been sustained on demurrer, or after verdict? I think not. There being various acts of felony, long concealed, &c., cannot vary the case. But, it was a breach of good behaviour to steal the cash of the Bank. So it would have been to assault the President or Cashier for coming to examine his books. But, it was a breach of his duty to spindle a check a second time, and take the money, which, if any one else had done, and he had known and concealed it, he would have violated his duty. Say he would be bound to discover such felony and fraud in another; no one is bound to accuse himself of a felony, nor can the condition of this bond be construed to bind him to do so, or that the bond shall be forfeited if he does not. Even if it was a bond expressly that he should not commit any felony in the Bank, he would not be bound to discover it on himself. The concealment was a mere non-discovery of the felony.

But, this question seems to me not to be presented by the breach assigned, or by the replication to the second plea. Both put it, as aforesaid, on the breach of trust, duty, confidence, &c. belonging to his actings and doings in his office of Accountant. The verdict negatives this. No loss, as to the cases in these first findings, arose to the Bank, or would have arisen, by any of them, if he had not stolen the money. Suppose, in order to pave the way for taking the money, he had made false entries, &c. had actually spindled a check, but had taken it off afterwards, on finding that he could not take the money at that time. The books being finally posted right, so that no loss was sustained, these acts, however contrary to duty and 234 good *intention, would not have been a breach of the bond, so as to subject the sureties. An intention to commit a felony, without doing it, is not indictable.

The verdict finds, that no loss was sustained, as to the matter in these first findings, except what arose from the act of taking the money from the drawer.

I think, therefore, there can be no Judgment for those sums: but, that we can enter Judgment for those in the other findings.

JUDGE CABELL.

In the case of Allison v. The Farmers' Bank, the objections to the Declaration are first to be considered. The most of these objections resolve themselves into one, viz: that the assignment of the breaches is too general. In this respect, this case bears a very strong resemblance to the cases of Strum v. Farrington, 1 Bos. & Pull. 640, and Barton v. Webb, 8 Term Rep. 459. In the first of these cases, the bond was conditioned for an agent's accounting for, and paying to the Plaintiffs, all such sums as he should receive as their agent. The breach assigned was, that the agent "had received divers sums of money, amounting to a large sum of money, viz: 2,000l., as agent, and had not accounted for, and paid, the said sum of 2,000l., or any part thereof." There was a special demurrer, on the ground that the assignment was too general, in not stating "from whom, or in what manner, or in what proportions, the said sums of money amounting to 2,000l., were received." It was held, however, that the assignment was sufficiently special.

In the case of Barton v. Webb, the bond was conditioned for a collector's accounting for, and paying over to the Plaintiffs as Treasurers of a Charity School, such voluntary contributions as he should collect for the use of the charity. The breach assigned was, that the collector "had received divers large sums of money, 235 amounting in the *whole to a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of 100l. of and from divers persons, and as for divers voluntary contributions, &c. for the use of the Charity School," and had not accounted and paid, &c. This assignment was demurred to, because the Plaintiffs had not named, or ascertained the persons from whom the collector had received the several sums of money mentioned in the breach, so as to enable the Defendant to meet the charge; and because the breach was too vague and general. This breach, also, was held to be sufficiently special.

The objection to the breaches in the case before us, as to generality and vagueness, is not stronger than it was in the cases just referred to; so far at least, as relates to the designation of persons, and of the sums received from each. It is true, that in the cases cited, the aggregate amount of the sum is stated. But, this appears to me to be an unimportant particular; for, the Plaintiff would not be bound to prove the amount stated; nor, was the statement of the aggregate amount necessary for enabling the Defendant to meet the charge. The objection as to vagueness and generality, is, therefore, entitled to no weight.

The breaches have been objected to on another ground; that the time is not stated with sufficient precision. The Declaration, it is true, has not paid much regard to form, in this respect. But, although the precise time is not mentioned, yet the breaches have been assigned as having been committed by Frayser, whilst acting as Accountant in the said Office; which, I think, is sufficient. I am not disposed to encourage objections, which, while they tend to produce delay, are not necessary for any of the purposes of justice.

The objection, that there is no statement of any amount of damage as having been sustained by the Bank, appears to me to be frivolous. This is an action of debt on a bond, the penalty of which is forfeited by a single breach of the condition, however small the damage occasioned by it may be.

At Common Law, the Judgment was entered accordingly, "for the whole penalty; and the Judgment is still to be thus entered. But, by the provisions of the Statute, it is to be discharged by the damages assessed by the Jury, for the breaches proved. But, the Plaintiff is not bound, even since the Statute, to do more than to state the condition of the bond, and to assign the breaches; nor is it usual for him, in assigning breaches, either in the Declaration or replication, to state the damages occasioned by the breaches. The Plaintiff's right to recover a Judgment for the whole penalty, is established by any breach of the condition; and it is the province of the Jury to assess the amount of damage sustained, and by payment of which, the Judgment for the penalty is to be discharged.

The demurrer to the Declaration was rightly overruled.

I come now to the merits of the case, as disclosed by the special verdict.

The Jury, in their 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 12th, 13th and 14th findings, set forth various acts of Frayser, by which the Bank, has, in fact, lost $25,615 32 cents. But, as the Jury doubted how far the Appellants are liable therefor, they pray the advice of the Court and say, "if upon the whole case, the Court is of opinion, that the Defendant is liable to the Plaintiffs, to the amount of $10,000, then we find for the Plaintiffs the debt in the Declaration mentioned: and if the Court shall be of opinion, that the Defendant is liable for a less sum than $10,000, then we find for the Plaintiffs the debt in the Declaration mentioned, to be discharged by the payment of such sum as the Court shall hold the Defendant liable for, upon the facts stated, with interest from the 1st of January, in the year 1818, till paid; so as such sum, with interest, exceed not $10,000." The Superior Court, being of opinion that the Law was for the Plaintiffs, gave Judgment for the debt in the Declaration mentioned.

It was admitted in the argument, by the Counsel for the Appellants, and indeed it could not be denied, that the acts of Frayser, producing the losses stated in the 12th, 13th and 14th findings of the Jury amounting to $3,115 32, are violations of the conditions of the bond, for which the Appellant is liable to the Appellees.

But the great question is, whether the Appellant is liable for any part of the losses sustained by the Bank, as set forth in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings of the Jury; which losses, as stated, amount to $22,500; or, in other words, whether the acts of Frayser, set forth in these findings, as producing the losses therein mentioned, are violations of the conditions of the bond.

The condition of the bond is, that Frayser "shall faithfully perform the duties assigned to, or trust be reposed in, him, as Accountant, and shall be of good behaviour in office, so long as he shall continue therein." As this bond was thus entered into solely for the purpose of making Frayser and his sureties responsible for the faithful discharge of his duties as Accountant, and for his good behaviour in that office, it is obvious that even Frayser himself would not be responsible on this bond, for any act of his whatever, that did not pertain to the duties of his office as Accountant. If, therefore, he had forcibly, or fraudulently, or feloniously, taken from the Bank, and converted to his own use, money belonging to the Bank, with the possession, safe-keeping, receipt or disbursement of which, he was not entrusted as Accountant, even Frayser himself would not be liable for it, in an action on this bond; because the act complained of, not pertaining to the duties of his office, as Accountant, is entirely out of the condition of the bond.

This principle, applied to the facts in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings, will be decisive of the question as to the liability of the Appellants, for the various losses therein set forth. These findings show that Frayser took fraudulently, improperly, and without the consent or knowledge of any other officer of the Bank, from the Teller's cash-drawer, divers sums of money belonging to the Bank; and they show the means by which he contrived to conceal such taking. These means of concealment consisted partly of the improper use of checks confided to his care, as Accountant; and partly, of fraudulent entries and omissions in the books kept by him, as Accountant. But, the Jury, in their 9th finding, say expressly, that all the sums of money mentioned in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings, "were wholly lost to the said Bank, by reason of the said Frayser obtaining the same from the Teller's cash-drawer;" and in their 10th finding, they also say expressly, that Frayser "was not, at any time, while he was Accountant, nor in anywise by virtue of his said office of Accountant, entrusted with, or put in possession of, the monies kept in the Teller's cash-drawer, or of any other money of the Bank, or entrusted with the safe keeping, receipt or disbursement of such monies;" and they go on to state circumstances, which show that the taking of the money by Frayser, was a theft committed by him on the Bank. It then clearly appears, that the loss to the Bank was occasioned by acts of Frayser, not pertaining to the duties of his office, and therefore, out of the condition of his bond.

But, it is contended by the Appellees, that the Jury, in their 5th finding, say, that Frayser took from the Teller's drawer, the sums mentioned in that finding, "by the fraudulent use of checks which had been previously paid in the regular way, and been confided to him as Accountant;" and that in the 9th finding, the Jury farther say, as to all the sums of money mentioned in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings, that "the said Frayser was enabled to obtain the same, by the fraudulent and improper use of checks in his possession as Accountant." It must be admitted, that it is difficult to say with certainty, what the Jury meant by the use of these expressions. A reference to the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th findings themselves, will show that all the sums of money therein mentioned, are found by the Jury to have been fraudulently and improperly taken by Frayser from the Teller's cash-drawer, without the consent or knowledge of 239 any other officer of the Bank; and the 10th finding shows, that such taking was theft. It is most manifest from the facts stated by the Jury themselves, that the use of the checks was not necessary to accomplish the taking, the stealing, of the money from the Teller's cash-drawer; and it is very remarkable, that as to the monies stated in the 6th, 7th, and 8th findings, no use whatever was made of any check, either as the means of taking the money, or of concealing the taking. In those cases, the taking was absolute, direct stealing, without any use of checks; and it was concealed solely by false entries and omissions in the books; and it is also manifest, that the Jury in the 4th finding, do not refer to the use of checks as a means of affecting the taking, but only as a means of concealment. And even in the 5th finding, the Jury, referring to the 4th finding, speak of the "like fraudulent use of checks." The whole verdict must be taken together; and taking it in this way, I think it probable, that the Jury meant no more by the expressions quoted in the 5th and 9th findings, than that the first improper use of a check, prevented a discovery of the first theft; and that that improper use was the remote and indirect cause of his being enabled to commit subsequent thefts; since, if the first theft had been discovered, it would have led to Frayser's removal from office, and would consequently have deprived him of the opportunity of committing the others.

But, let it be, that the Jury meant what they certainly could not mean without contradicting themselves, and finding against positive facts; let it be, that the Jury meant that the fraudulent use of checks by Frayser was the means, by which he was enabled to commit the several thefts mentioned in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings. Even then, it will be found that the loss sustained by the Bank is to be referred to the acts of stealing the money, and not to the facilities or means by which he was enabled to steal it. And so the Jury have expressly declared in their 9th finding; for, they there say, that "all 240 the sums of money mentioned in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings, hereinbefore stated, were wholly lost to the said Bank, by reason of the said Frayser obtaining the same from the Teller's cash-drawer, in the manner stated in our said findings;" which manner of obtaining it amounted, as I have before observed, to theft. Nor, when the Jury have said, that the damages sustained by the Bank arose from the thefts of money by Frayser, with which money, Frayser, as Accountant, had nothing to do, such damage, cannot be recovered on a bond, whose sole object was to provide an indemnity for damage arising from misconduct in office.

It cannot be denied, that Frayser's fraudulent use of checks entrusted to him as Accountant, and that his fraudulent entries and omissions in the books kept by him as Accountant, were violations of the conditions of his official bond. This was admitted, even by the Counsel for the Appellant; and if the Jury had said, that the sums of money mentioned in the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th findings, were lost to the Bank by such fraudulent use of checks, or such fraudulent entries and omissions, there would be no doubt that the Appellant would be liable for them, to the amount of the penalty of the bond. But, the Jury have not said so. On the contrary, they have said that they were lost by his theft of monies, with which, as Accountant, he had nothing to do.

If it be said, that these violations of duty, in the improper use of checks, would justify at least nominal damages, I reply, that where breaches are assigned, and real damages are given for them, there is no room for the application of the Common Law principle as to nominal damages.

I am of opinion to reverse the Judgment, and to enter it for the debt in the Declaration mentioned, to be discharged by the payment of $3,115 32 cents, with interest thereon from the 1st of January, 1818, till paid, &c.

241 *Caldwell v. Farmers' Bank of Virginia.

March, 1828.

The Declaration in this case is the same as that in the case of Allison v. The Farmers' Bank, with two exceptions:

1. The assignment of breaches is not followed by an allegation, that the Plaintiffs are injured by the breaches, but simply, that in consequence of the breaches, an action has accrued to the Plaintiffs to demand and have the penalty of the bond. The Declaration, in stating the bond, the condition, and the breaches, states all that was necessary to entitle them to their action for the penalty. For, the Law implies damage from the breach; and it is not incumbent on a party to state what the Law necessarily implies.

2. After stating the right of the Plaintiffs to their action for the penalty of the bond, and the refusal of the Defendants to pay the penalty, it is not stated that that refusal was to the damage of the Plaintiffs, but that "therefore they bring suit," &c. I cannot think there is anything in this objection. The action of debt lies to recover a sum of money in numero. In such actions, and particularly for the penalty of a bond, the damages are, in general, nominal; and none need be stated, unless the Plaintiff goes for damages beyond the penalty.

I think the Declaration is good; and the merits being precisely the same as in the case of Allison v. The Farmers' Bank, the same Judgment should be entered as in that case.

Judgments reversed, &c.*

Depositions*—Regularity—Presumption in Appellate Court.—If there be no objection made to the regularity of a Deposition in a Court of Law, the Court of Appeals will presume it was properly taken, although there is neither a commission nor notice in the record.

Same.—When Admissible as Evidence.†—It is improper to read a Deposition in a Court of Law: on account of the absence of the witness, unless the party offering it proves that he has used due diligence to find the witness, or that he is not within the jurisdiction of the Court, and the reach of its process.

Assumpsit by Robert Wiley against Alexander Tompkins and three others, merchants and partners trading under the firm of Alexander Tompkins & Co., charging them as bailees of certain goods shipped by Richard Ashhurst, of Philadelphia, to the Plaintiff; and which, by the carelessness and negligence of the Defendants in keeping them, were totally lost to the Plaintiff. At the trial before the Superior Court of Law for Bedford county, the Defendants excepted to an opinion of the Court. The Bill of Exceptions sets forth, that at the trial the Plaintiff offered in evidence the Deposition of Jacob Kaskaden; and for the purpose of proving that the said witness was out of the Commonwealth, he introduced a witness, who stated, that Kaskaden was a single man having no family, and had resided as a store-keeper in the town of Fincastle; that about twelve or eighteen months ago, he heard the said Jacob say that he was going to Ireland; about which time he left Fincastle, as the witness supposed, for the purpose of visiting Ireland; but, after an absence of some weeks, he returned to Fincastle, and upon being asked if he had so soon returned from Ireland, he replied that he had only been to the City of New-York. After the return of the said Jacob from New-York, he remained a short time about and in the town of Fincastle, until about twelve months past, when he left that town, and went to places unknown to the witness, nor has the witness heard that he resides any where within or without the Commonwealth; has never heard any enquiries made about him, nor had he heard 243 *any thing about his intention to leave the State as above stated. Upon being asked the question, this witness further said, that he had not only never heard that the said Jacob was out of the Commonwealth, but that he had never heard a rumor to that effect, nor any rumor about where he was, since he had gone away from Fincastle, except that some time after he had left Fincastle, the Plaintiff said he had received a letter from him in which letter he announced that he had gone down the river to New Orleans, but the witness did not know the hand-writing of the said Jacob. The Plaintiff also introduced another witness, who stated that the said Jacob was a single man without any family, and had lived until eight or nine months past in Fincastle, but the witness does not know where he now resides; that he has never heard that he proposed to leave the State, except that he thinks that the Plaintiff in this case showed him a letter which the Plaintiff represented as being from the said Jacob; in which letter, the said Jacob said something about going to New Orleans, but the witness is wholly unacquainted with the hand-writing of the said Jacob, and does not know that the letter aforesaid was written by him. This witness further stated, that except as to the aforesaid letter, he had not only never heard that the said Jacob was out of the Commonwealth, but that he had not even heard a rumor to that effect, having heard nothing about him respecting the place to which he was gone, and where he intended to go and reside: he only knew that he had gone away to parts unknown to the witness, leaving no business or connexions behind him: he had heard nothing said about him. This being all the evidence on this point, the Defendants objected to reading the Deposition, because it did not appear from the foregoing facts that the witness was either out of the Commonwealth, or unable to attend the Court; but, the Court overruled the objection, and admitted the Deposition to be read. Verdict and Judgment for the Plaintiff for $349 85, and the Defendants obtained a Supersedeas to the Judgment.

244 *Johnson, for the Plaintiffs in Error.

Leigh, for the Defendant in Error.

February 12. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.†

There being no objection stated in the Bill of Exceptions touching the regularity of the Deposition, it must be presumed to have been properly taken, though there is neither a commission nor a notice in the record. Whether it ought to have been read is the only question.

A party, to entitle himself to read a Deposition because of the absence of the witness, must show that he has used due diligence to find him, or that he is not within the jurisdiction of the Court, and the breach of its process. Falconer v. Hanson, 1 Camp. 171. The evidence set out in the Bill of Exceptions falls very far short of this. Most of it is but rumor. It by no means appears that due diligence was used by the Plaintiff to find the witness, or that he was without the reach of the process of the Court. The Judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, in which the Deposition is not to be read, without sufficient proof of the inability of the Plaintiff to produce the witness.

March, 1838.

Milldam*—Abatement—Equity Jurisdiction.—When a Corporation claims a right to abate a milldam as a nuisance, because it obstructs the navigation of a stream, and such abatement would produce great loss to the mill-owner, and great inconvenience to the public, a Court of Equity has jurisdiction to prevent such abatement, and to preserve to the mill-owner his establishment, until the question, whether the mill-owner has, or has not, a right to keep up his dam, be decided.

Same—Same—Same.—The inadequacy of the damages which any Jury could give to the mill-owner in a suit against a Corporation, for the loss and injury sustained by him, by the removal of his dam, is also a good ground for the interposition of equity.

Mills—Rights of Owners in Streams.—Although grants of land to individuals may include the bed and banks of streams, or rivers, yet the public have a right to the use of all such streams, or rivers, for the purpose of navigation; but the Legislature, (representing the sovereign power,) may confer on individuals, by General Laws, or particular grants, rights in opposition to, and paramount to this public right, and such paramount rights have been conferred on owners of mills, by the General Law authorising the Courts to establish mills.

Same—Grant of—Right Vested in Grantee Thereby.—Mills are considered, by our Laws, as great public conveniences and benefits: they are regulated by Law: they are never established except on the requisition of a Jury; amongst other things, the Jury are bound to enquire, whether ordinary navigation will be obstructed, and if they report that it will not, then leave is granted to erect the mill without any condition as to navigation. Such a grant, under such a precautionary proceeding, is a perfect one, and vests in the grantee all the public right to the stream, or so much thereof as is necessary to the full enjoyment of the mill erected under the order.

Same—Statute Placing Additional Burdens on Owner—Constitutionality.—After a mill has been established, and a dam erected according to Law whereby the use of the water for grinding has been granted to the mill-owner a subsequent Act of Assembly, which imposes on him the burthen of erecting locks through his dam, of keeping the locks in repair, and of giving attendance at the locks, so as to admit the passage of boats, and on his failure, vests in a Company the power to abate the dam as a nuisance, without a full indemnification, and equivalent for the injury thus done to his vested rights, is contrary to the Constitution of the State, and void.

The Plaintiffs, Ashbury Crenshaw, and Thomas B. Crenshaw, exhibited their Bill to the Judge of the Superior Court of Chancery for the Richmond District, praying for an Injunction against the "Trustees of the Slate River Company," a Corporation of that name, created by an Act of the General Assembly, passed 246 on the 29th January, *1819. They allege that they are the owners in fee simple of a valuable water-grist mill, in Buckingham county, built on a water-course called Slate River; that the mill is supplied with water by a dam erected across the said river pursuant to Law, at a place where they (the Plaintiffs) are the fee simple owners of the bed of the water-course, and of the lands on both sides thereof.

They trace back their title to the said land and bed of the river, to a patent issued on the 10th January, 1726, granting 1600 acres of land to James Skelton, including the land on which the mill and dam are situated, and the bed of the river. In October, 1727, Skelton sold and conveyed the said land to George Nicholas, and from him it passed to his son John Nicholas, who obtained from the County Court of Buckingham, on the 13th May, 1765, an order authorising him to build and erect a dam across the said river on the said land; and in pursuance thereof, the said John Nicholas did build a mill and erect a dam on the site now occupied by the dam of the Plaintiffs. John Nicholas, in 1795, devised the land on which the mill and dam were erected, to his son Robert Nicholas, who in 1802, petitioned the County Court for leave to erect a water-grist mill on his own land on Slate River, were John Nicholas formerly had a mill. A Writ of Ad Quod Damnum was awarded, and the Jury found among other things that ordinary navigation will not be obstructed, and on the 12th July, 1802, an unconditional order to build the mill was granted him. On the 21st September, 1802, he sold and conveyed to Charles A. Scott, who proceeded to erect the mill and dam at the site aforesaid at very great expense. Scott sold and conveyed in 1807, to John Cunningham, from whom it passed to his daughter Letitia Taylor, who, with her husband Archibald Taylor, conveyed on the 28th July, 1824, to the Plaintiffs. Thus, they allege, that the title to the land, with the bed of the water-course, and the undisturbed possession thereof has *remained with the original patentee, and those claiming under him, for a space of almost one hundred years.

They allege that Slate River, within the bounds of Skelton's patent, is a small stream, many miles above tide-water and ship navigation, and was not, at the time of the grant, used for navigation of any sort.

They allege that on the 18th December, 1794, the Legislature passed an Act, for improving the navigation of Slate River, by which Trustees are appointed to raise

*Same—Equity Jurisdiction.—On this subject the principal case is cited with approval in Miller v. Trueheart, 4 Leigh 578; Bull v. Read, 13 Gratt. 87.

In Keystone Bridge Co. v. Summers, 18 W. Va. 485, it is said: "If the right of the public to the use of a highway is clear, and a special injury is threatened by an obstruction of the highway, and this special injury is serious, reaching the very substance and value of the plaintiff's estate, and is permanent in its character, a court of equity by an injunction ought to prevent such a nuisance. *Same—Rights of Owners in Stream.—The legislature, by giving a court power to grant a milldam right, vests property in the owner of the mill, which cannot be taken away without compensation, because the legislature may grant a right impairing public right of navigation. Dissenting opinion of BRANNON J., in Pickens v. Coal River Boom & Timber Co., 51 W. Va. 445, 41 S. E. Rep. 403, citing principal case as authority.

And in State v. Elk Island Boom Co., 41 W. Va. 799, 24 S. E. Rep. 591, it is said: "Such booms and dams are considered by our laws as public conveniences, and the legislature, representing in this regard the sovereign power, may confer on individuals and corporations by general law, as in this case, rights in opposition and paramount to this public right. Crenshaw v. Slate River Co. (1838), 6 Rand. (Va.) 245." To the same point the principal case is cited in Barre v. Flemings, 29 W. Va. 319, 1 S. E. Rep. 736; James River & Kanawha Co. v. Turner, 9 Leigh 325.

The principal case was also cited in Ex parte Hunter, 3 W. Va. 160; Carter v. Railway Co., 26 W. Va. 654.

money by subscription for that purpose; and that by the 4th section, owners of mills on the river are required to erect locks or slopes for the passage of batteaus of four tons burthen, and of fish, at their own expense, and to keep them in good repair. [See Sessions Acts of 1794, ch. 48, p. 29.] But that, as they are informed, no subscriptions were raised under that Act, and nothing was done for the improvement of the river; the scheme being found impracticable and was abandoned.

That another Act passed 29th January, 1819, entitled "An Act for improving the navigation of Slate River," whereby a Joint Stock Company was incorporated by the name and style of "The Trustees of Slate River," [See Sessions Act of 1818, ch. 37,] for improving the navigation of the river "from its junction with the James River, to the highest practicable point of improvement;" and the improvement required by Law is, that the river should be made "capable of being navigated in ordinary seasons, by vessels drawing one foot water." When the river is thus made navigable, it is declared to be a public highway, and the Company are entitled to tolls.

That by the 10th and 11th sections of the said Act, the owners of mills are required, within six months after the navigation shall have been completed to their several mills, to erect good and sufficient locks through their dams, or on canals around them, so as to procure a safe and easy passage for loaded boats; to keep them in repair, and to cause constant attendance to be given by some person who will 248 *enable the boats to have free passage through them; and on failure so to do, a fine of $20 is imposed on the offender for every time such failure shall happen, and the offender is moreover liable to the party grieved for damages. And if the owners of the mills shall refuse or fail to erect the locks within eighteen months, the mill-dams are declared to be nuisances, and may be abated: and the Trustees are empowered to clear them away, and to charge the expense of doing so to the owners of the mills.

They allege, that their dam is situated about a mile and a quarter above the mouth of the river; that from the dam to the mouth, the stream has been used to transport the manufacture of the mill ever since its erection by Scott, long before the passage of this Act; that the dam is built at the foot of a succession of rapids, which never were navigable, and never could have been made so without great expense; that the dam is seventeen feet high, and causes the water to flow back only about three quarters of a mile; that no part of the stream above the dam has ever been used for the purpose of navigation, as they have been informed, except on one occasion, when a single boat with two hogs heads of tobacco passed down in high water many years ago; that the obstructions to navigation above their mill are such, that they believe the Company could not be induced to encounter the expense of removing them, either for the public good, or their own emolument, if they were bound to bear the whole expense of the improvement; but, there having been constructed on the river five mills, the dams of which have been erected on the faith of the General Law in relation to mills, and their dams having made eddy water for about twelve miles, one-third of the distance over which the improvement is contemplated, the expense of improving the residue of the distance may be within the competency of the Company; that these dams together, are believed to be between sixty-three and sixty-five feet in height, and to have covered with their ponds the most difficult part of 249 the river to be improved; that if *the Company can now charge the mill-owners with the expense of locks, while they will throw an immense burthen off their own shoulders, they will tax with an unjust and grievous burthen, those very individuals who have already done so much for the improvement of the river, and whose mills are a great public benefit; that, notwithstanding these considerations, the Company are proceeding to impose on the Plaintiffs, and the other mill-owners, the whole burthen of making locks at their dams, of keeping them in repair, and causing them to be attended to in the manner prescribed by the Act of Assembly.

They state, that they had received a written notice from the Company, apprising them that the navigation has been completed for six months, from the mouth of the river up to their dam, and requiring them to proceed to the erection of the locks. They say that the navigation above is not yet improved so as to be fit for use, and cannot be for a considerable time; so that if they are bound to make them at all, there can be no utility in making them at this time; yet, if the Act aforesaid, so far as it relates to the mill-owners, be Law, and if they (the Plaintiffs) are bound by it, they are now exposed to the danger of being prosecuted and harassed by the Company, or by any vexatious individuals who may choose to prosecute for the fines, and in the course of a few months, they will be exposed to the danger of having their dam, which is valuable to them and the public, regarded as a nuisance, and abated by the Company.

They charge, that the Act, so far as it requires the mill-owners to build and repair, and superintend the locks, is without authority and void; that they are advised they are not bound to build the locks; that no fine could be lawfully imposed on them for failure to do so, and that their dam could not be lawfully abated by the Company for such failure; but, they do not desire to engage in so inconvenient, perplexing and hazardous a controversy, as that which 250 would arise at Law, in repeated efforts to fine *them, or in an attempt to abate the nuisance; that such a controversy would be alike detrimental to their interest, and that of the Company; and that while they are threatened with the penalties of the Law for not doing what they are advised they are not bound to do, they can neither enjoy their property in quiet, nor bring it to market with safety.

They therefore pray, that, as they are without remedy at Law, the Slate River Company may be made Defendants to their Bill; that themselves may be quieted in the possession and enjoyment of their property, free from the claim of the Company to have the locks built by them; and that the Company, their agents, and all others, may be enjoined from prosecuting them for fines and from abating and disturbing their dam.

This Bill of Injunction was exhibited on the 28th March, 1825. The Patent, Deeds, Acts of Assembly, and other Documents referred to, were annexed to the Bill. The Injunction was awarded on the next day. The Trustees of the Slate River Company filed their Answer on the 5th August of the same year.

The Answer of the Defendants, the Slate River Company, is to the following effect:

They admit the emanation of a Grant to Skelton, the execution of the several Deeds, the transmission of the lands patented, and the other documents referred to, so far as matters of fact are proved by those exhibits; but, they deny that the bed or stream of Slate River was ever so disposed of, or granted to Skelton, or those claiming under him, as to preclude or impair the rights vested in the Slate River Company by Law, and the natural rights which appertain to the people of Virginia to apply the stream for the purpose of navigation.

They say, that as early as 5th November, 1788, the Legislature passed a Law appointing Commissioners to examine the natural and artificial obstructions to Slate River, and to give their opinion

251 whether it was practicable *to make the stream navigable, and to report to the next Assembly. In December, 1790, they passed another Law reviving the former, appointing additional Commissioners, requiring any three to perform the duty assigned by the former Law, and to report. That on the 18th December, 1794, (at which time neither the Plaintiffs, nor any one from whom they claim, had any mill-dam, or right to erect any mill-dam across Slate River,) the Legislature passed the Act referred to in the Bill. That by that Law it is asserted, that it had been represented to them, that the extension of the navigation of the Slate River would be of public utility, and it is probable this representation was made by the Commissioners. That before the year 1794, the mill-dam erected by John Nicholas was down, and continued down so long that neither he, nor any one claiming under him, could lawfully erect the dam anew, without a new order from the County Court. Whatever then might be the legal effect of the order of 1765, yet the rights given thereby were lost to the builder of the dam, and those claiming under him; and before the order of July, 1802, was made, the Legislature appropriated Slate River to the purposes of navigation, in exclusion of any rights which the Plaintiffs, or those under whom they claim, have, or may have had.

They say, that the dam of the Plaintiffs is not erected at the same place on which the dam of John Nicholas was built; that Slate River, at the Plaintiffs' mills, and for many miles up, and to its junction with James River, is a stream large enough to be used, and well suited to be improved for the purposes of navigation, to the great benefit of the public; that in its natural state, and as far back as during the War of the Revolution, it has been used for transportation; that after the dam of John Nicholas was down, the stream, for some distance above the Plaintiffs' mill, and even above the lands ever owned by John Nicholas, was used for transportation.

252 *They deny that nothing was done under the Act of 1794, to improve the navigation of the river. They say, that the persons appointed by that Act, divided the river into sections, and allotted the sections to persons who did much work on it; that one section, as difficult as any other, was allotted to Francis Harris, who nearly put his section in order for navigation; that the scheme was never abandoned from the belief that it could not be carried into effect; that those concerned in the undertaking under the Act of 1794, determined that it might be made navigable at the very time when there was no dam across the stream near the present dam of the Plaintiffs. They believed, that the neighbours on the stream might make it navigable to Kidd's Falls; and from that point to some little distance below, they would have to employ a man, and spend some money to remove the rocks about the Falls, and obstructions in the stream.

They claim all the rights vested in them by the Act of 1819; and insist, that the Complainants have no right to ask an exemption from any burthens or duties imposed by that Law.

They say, that the Plaintiffs' mill is situated about one and a quarter, or two miles from the mouth of the river; that the dam is about seventeen feet high, and causes the water to flow back between three quarters of a mile and one mile and a half.

They admit, that the river between the mill of the Plaintiffs and Kidd's Falls, a distance of three or four miles, abounds with rocks and falls that would be expensive to remove; but, they deny that they would give over the undertaking in which they have engaged, if there was no mill-dam on the river. They believe the mill-dams are an hindrance and an inconvenience to the works for improving the navigation. They admit, that the water in the mill is generally confined to the banks of the stream. The ponds are deep, and much wider than other parts of the stream; and in the winter will retain 253 the ice much *longer than the other parts of the stream, and thereby obstruct navigation longer. They say, that the mill-owners can manage to stop the water in its passage down, so as to produce delay in navigation; but, if there were no dams on the river, except those belonging to the Company, placed where they might be used, as they were required, under the sole management of the Company, it would be in the power of the Company, by the use of their lock-dams and works, to obviate, in a great degree, the inconvenience arising from scarcity of water, drought, or ice. They admit, that the eddies formed by the mill-dams are about twelve miles, and the Company contemplate carrying the navigation to Buckingham Court-house, a distance of about forty miles; but, they deny that these eddies are beneficial to the Company in their work. They say, that if they were to erect locks at their own expense in the mill-dam, they would spend more money than would be required to improve the stream from its natural state; and after they have encountered such expense, if the dams should be allowed by the mill-owners to go down, the locks of the Company would be destroyed, and they would be compelled to go to work on the bed of the stream. The locks erected in the dams of the millers, would require greater skill, and would be much more difficult to be kept in repair than the dams of the Company, erected just where the Company want them.

They say, that from the time of the passage of the Law in 1819, to December, 1823, great efforts were made to raise the stock, and form the Company, which was well known to Archibald Taylor, the then owner of the Plaintiffs' mill, who subscribed for two shares of the stock, on the agreement that he might expend it in improving the navigation below his mill; that he placed a lock-dam between his mill and the mouth of the river, for the Company, which he used in navigating the river to his mill, and the Plaintiffs also, since they purchased: that the Plaintiffs purchased from Archibald Taylor, after 254 the Company *had been formed; had spent a large sum of money in the work, and had succeeded in procuring a passage of Laws to obtain a subscription on the part of the Commonwealth, from the Fund for Internal Improvement: that the Plaintiffs have become purchasers with a full knowledge of all circumstances, and now demand to be freed from an obligation which they are bound by Law to bear: that the Defendants being apprised of the temper of the Plaintiffs, and of their disposition to impede the operations of the Company, gave them the notice of which they complain.

They admit that the river had not been made navigable to the Plaintiffs' dam, from above, but they assert that it had been from below, and that the Company had done nearly a fourth of the entire work, and but for the mill-dams, they believe the work might be completed by the Fall of 1825. They say, they believe the work practicable, and when finished, will be of great public utility.

They deny, that the County Court has any power or authority to make an order (in favor of a petitioner for leave to erect a mill,) whereby the mill-owner shall have the right to appropriate to himself the privilege of excluding the people of the Commonwealth the right of navigating the streams of the Commonwealth: that it is the duty of the County Courts to remove obstructions to navigation, but they have no right to throw impediments to navigation, in the way of those who live on the upper part of the streams.

They contend, that although ships can never navigate Slate River, yet that the streams which are susceptible of navigation, are under the control of the Legislature, and that the owners of dams across them may be subjected to such terms as to the Legislature may seem just: that before and since the Revolution, to secure the passage of fish, and to improve navigation, the Legislature have required owners of mill-dams to erect locks or slopes, in their dams: and that the privilege of navigating streams is a natural right.

255 *They do not admit the right of a Court of Equity, by any Decree, to stand in the way of a determination of a Court of Law, on any of the matters set forth in the Plaintiffs' Bill. They deny all fraud, and all disposition to oppress, or be oppressed.

To this Answer a general replication was filed, and the parties proceeded to take the Depositions of numerous witnesses. It is not deemed necessary to report any part of that evidence. So far as it was necessary to explain any point decided by the Court, the Judges have referred to the evidence.

In June, 1826, the Chancellor dissolved the Injunction, and the Plaintiffs appealed to this Court.

March 27. The Judges delivered their opinions.*

JUDGE CARR.

The Plaintiffs are the owners of a mill on Slate River; the Defendants are the "Trustees of the Slate River," formed into a Corporation of the Act of 1819, for the purpose of improving the navigation of that river. The Act directs, among other things, that the owners of mills on the river shall, within six months after navigation shall have been completed to their mills, erect good and sufficient locks through their dams or on canals, proper and convenient around them, so as to furnish a safe and expeditious passage for loaded boats, &c. up and down the river; and moreover, shall keep the said locks in good repair, and cause some person to give constant attendance at the same, whose duty it shall be to work and manage 256 the locks at all *times, when thereto required by any person wishing to pass through them with craft, giving them free passage without delay; and on failure so to do, the offender, for every offence, shall forfeit $20, and be moreover liable to the party aggrieved for damages. And it is enacted, that if any owner of a mill shall fail to build such lock within eighteen months as aforesaid; his dam is declared a nuisance, and shall be abated, thrown down and destroyed; and the Trustees are empowered and directed to clear it away at the cost of the owner. Proceeding under this Act, the Trustees have given notice to the Plaintiffs, owners of the Virginia Mills, a short distance above the mouth of Slate River, that navigation has been completed up to their mills for six months, and requiring them to proceed to the erection of the locks, agreeably to the requisition of the Act. Against this proceeding, the Plaintiffs protest, as oppressive and against Law, as unconstitutional and void; and as they are liable to motions for the $20 fine, by every one who may choose to call on them for passage, and will very soon be liable to have their dam thrown down, and irreparable injury done to their large and valuable mill establishment, they pray an Injunction, and a decision of the matter in Equity. The Injunction was granted, unless the Defendants, on being served with the order, should shew cause to the contrary, by the 10th day of the next Term. The time for answer was afterwards enlarged. The Answer was filed, much evidence on both sides taken; and the Court, upon argument, discharged the order, upon a principle which, if correctly decided, puts an end to the cause.

In the argument, several questions, deep, grave and important, were raised. Some of these, I shall pass over entirely, and touch others, so far only, as seems absolutely necessary to the decision of the case. I shall do this, not from a wish to avoid trouble, but because some of the questions are too large, and open too wide a range of enquiry, for the time I have had to bestow on them.

257 *The first objection taken by the Appellees, was, to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. The testimony I have borne on this subject, has been such, I believe, as to shield me from the suspicion of inclining to that loose practice, which, acting upon the particular case, without looking to any general rule, tends to destroy every thing like system, and to break down the barrier between Common Law and Equity. In her appropriate sphere, however, I would carefully support Equity; because I think the due exercise of her legitimate powers, most salutary. One instance, clearly proper for the interposition of Equity, is, where the damages of a Jury would not compensate; the owner attaching some extraordinary value to the chattel sought. Such was the case of the Pusey Horn, 1 Vern. 273; the patera of the Duke of Somerset, 3 P. Wms. 389; the silver tobacco box, Fells v. Read, 3 Ves. 70, &c. Another acknowledged, and most useful ground of equitable aid, is, to prevent irreparable mischief by the destruction of property, while the right of the parties are in litigation. The cases under this head are numerous, and may be found in any book of reference. Waste, breaking up of meadow, of a garden, &c., are among them. In the case of Nuthrown v. Thornton, 10 Ves. 159, Lord Eldon ordered the stock, &c. on a farm, seized by the landlord under a distress for rent and bill of sale, to be specifically restored, considering that under the particular agreement it was not liable to that proceeding. He says, "Upon the particular circumstances also the Court would be justified in interposing, to prevent the destruction of the property, until the rights were ascertained, upon the principle of irreparable mischief. It is said, the Plaintiff might have damages. But, how are damages to be estimated in such a case? The directions to the Jury must be, to give, not the value of these chattels merely, but their value to this man, having this farm, enabling him to use them for cultivation," &c.

258 *In the case before us, the Plaintiffs have mills, which have cost them upwards of $20,000; the dam itself, as Mr. Scott tells us, cost more than $3,000. This establishment, we are told, deals largely in wheat and the other products of the country; thereby making profit to itself, and affording to the citizens the convenience of a ready market for wheat, corn, and other articles. If the dam were destroyed by the Trustees, there would be the direct loss of its cost, the damages resulting, and the inconvenience to the public from the sudden stoppage of such an establishment; and all this mischief, being actually suffered, the mill-owner would be left to sue a Corporation for damages. It is not better to let this dam stand, and the mills go on, till the matter of right be decided? I think so, clearly; and that it is a case directly within the appropriate range of the preventive, and (if I may so say) the preservative powers of a Court of Equity.

It was next objected, that the Plaintiffs stand in the place of Taylor, who had full notice of the Law, assented to it, and aided its progress; and that he was therefore bound by it, and they equally so. Every freeholder may be said in some sort to assent to the Laws passed in a Legislature where he is represented; but such assent, I apprehend, would not bind him, if a Law were passed conveying his property to another citizen. The assent, then, must be something more than merely standing by, and not protesting against the Law. Taylor's rights, whatever they were, were vested rights at the passage of the Law. He was the owner of the mills. Has he done any thing to divest those rights? If not, they still exist in the Plaintiffs, and they are legal rights, and must be so considered though brought into equity for their preservation. It is insisted, that the taking two shares of stock by Taylor, was such assent as bound him; but I cannot think that was a surrender of his legal rights. He took them on the express understanding that he was to pay for them in locks put into the river below his mill, which were necessary for him, 259 *whether the river was cleared higher up, or not; which he had determined to make for his own use; and which, when he did make, he had very little idea, as he tells us, that the scheme would ever be carried into execution. The only equity this could raise against him, would be, that he stood by and saw the work going on, without objecting. But this, it seems to me, would not be a good objection; for, till his rights were called in question, till he received notice to make the locks, it was not necessary for him to take any active step. But this objection, if applicable to Taylor, is not brought home to the Plaintiffs, by any notice. Neither do I think, that the clause in the Law, exempting Taylor, his heirs and assigns, from paying toll on property carried from his mill down the river, has the effect of binding him to stand by this Law. There is no proof that he had any agency, or gave any assent to this clause. It may well be supposed to proceed from a sense of justice in the Legislature, prompting them to make the owners of the mill some small return for the many burthens the Law was imposing on them.

The next objection I shall notice, is, that the Virginia Mills were not legally established. I am not sure that we can take this objection first in this Court, and in this collateral way; but the objection itself seems unfounded. The application to the Court was to build a mill, and that would seem to include every thing necessary, but especially a dam; for, if no dam had been intended, no leave of Court would have been necessary; and when we look at the Inquest, we cannot doubt for a moment, that a dam was in contemplation. The Jury are directed to enquire into the damages which may accrue from overflowing the lands above and below, and whether any mansion-house, garden, &c. will be overflowed; and that they report upon all these subjects. This would all be a farce, upon any other idea, than that of a dam; especially on a site where there is so much fall, that a dam seventeen feet high does not throw the water a mile back.

260 *But it is said, that the Act of 1794, took from the County Court all power to give leave for erecting mills on Slate River, by declaring it a public highway. There certainly is no express prohibition to the County Court, to exercise the power which was vested in them by the General Law; and the clause of the Act making the highway, is in these words: "And be it further enacted, that after the said river shall be made navigable for the passage of boats, agreeably to the provisions of this Act, the same shall be deemed and taken to be a public highway." This clause, it will be seen, while it admits that the river was not then navigable, or a public highway, does not go immediately and absolutely to change its character, but only enacts, that after it shall be made navigable, under that Act, it shall be a public highway. Now, we have it in evidence, that the whole scheme contemplated by that Act, failed. No subscriptions were raised; no money paid; no labor, to speak of, bestowed. In short, the whole project was abandoned, and the Law a dead letter. The present Trustees are created under an Act passed twenty-five years after, having no reference to, or connection with, the former. I think, therefore, that no aid can be derived from this source, to impeach the power of the County Court to grant leave to build the mill.

We come now to the main question: Are the Plaintiffs bound by the provisions of the Act of 1819? Must they either erect locks, and keep due attendance at them, or have their dam destroyed as a nuisance?

The importance and delicacy of this question need not be enlarged on. It is forced upon us, and we must either meet it, or shrink from our duty.

In ascertaining the character of streams, and the power of the Sovereign over them, we must look to the Common Law, and the operation of our own legislation. The best and most authoritative Treatise on this subject, and that indeed from which all who have written since seem to have drawn, is Lord Hale's Tract De Jure

261 Maris, &c., published *by Hargrave in his Law Tracts. He says, pages 8, 9: "There be some streams or rivers, that are private, not only in propriety and ownership, but also in use, as little streams or rivers that are not a common passage for the King's people." Again: "There be other rivers, as well fresh as salt, that are of common or public use, for carriage of boats and lighters, and these, whether they are fresh or salt, whether they flow and reflow, or not, are prima facie, publici juris, common highways for man or goods, or both, from one inland town to another. Thus, (he observes,) the rivers of Wey, of Severn, of Thames, and divers others, as well above the bridges and ports, as below, and as well where they are become private property, as in what parts they are of the King's property, are public rivers, publici juris, and therefore all nuisances and impediments of passage of boats and vessels, though in the private soil of any person, may be punished by Indictment, and removed." Again, p. 5, he says: "Fresh rivers, of what kind soever, do of common right, belong to the owners of the soil adjacent, so that the owners of one side, have of common right the propriety of the soil, and consequently the right of fishing usque ad filum aquæ; and the owners of the other side, the right of soil or ownership and fishing unto the filum aquæ, on their side; and if a man be owner of the land on both sides, in common presumption, he is owner of the whole river, and hath the right of fishing, according to the extent of his land in length. With this (he adds,) agrees the common experience." These extracts mark with more precision than any thing I have met with in any other Common Law writer, what constitutes a public river, and the distinction between such as are public, and those which may become private property. These distinctions are supported by the cases. Lord Fitzwalter's Case, 1 Mod. 105; Carter v. Murcot, 4 Burr. 2162; The Royal Fishery in the River Banne, Dav. Rep. 152. See, also, Palmer v. Mulligan, 3 Caines' Rep. 307; Shaw v. Crawford, &c., 10 Johns. Rep. 236; The People v. Platt, 17 Johns. Rep. 195.

262 *At the Common Law, then, we see that some rivers were public, some private; and of those considered private, that some were subject to the servitude of the public interest, and in that sense common highways by water. The mark of distinction between those which are entirely private property, and those which are subject to the public use and enjoyment, consists in the fact, whether or not they can be used as a common passage for the public.

Applying this Common Law criterion to the Slate River, I have no doubt that it must be considered a private, innavigable stream; and that the patent to Skelton in 1726, conveying the land on both sides, and including the river in its bounds, gave him the property in the bed of the stream; and that he had, to the extent of his land, the exclusive right of fishery. But, this would give him no right to obstruct the passage of fish; for, all the riparian owners have the same right to the enjoyment of the stream with all its advantages, and the natural run of the fish of passage is one of these. Whether the right to the banks and bed of the stream, derived from the patent of 1726, was an absolute and exclusive right, or a right held subject to the jus publicum; in other words, whether the Legislature could, at any subsequent period, have this river rendered navigable, and make it a public highway for boats and other craft, without a violation of the rights of Skelton, and those claiming under him, is one of those questions which I do not mean to discuss. The cause may be decided on other grounds. It will not be derided, I presume, that the Sovereign Power, (with us the Legislature,) in whom resides this jus publicum, may, in their discretion, grant it away. It is to be taken, that they will never make this grant, but for the public benefit. Of that, however, they must be the Judges. They have the power; and the grant fairly made will bind them and their successors. The whole course of our legislation shows, that mills have at all times been considered great public conveniences and benefits, and as such, taken under the protection, encouragement

263 and *regulation of the Laws: made in fact public establishments. In proof of this, various Laws may be cited; such as those regulating their tolls, their weights and measures, that they shall grind the grist in due turn, &c. Particular privileges, too, are given them. The miller is exempt (or was till lately) from militia duty. They have a right to condemn an acre of land for an abatement. They may overflow the lands of another. These privileges are forfeited, if a miller fails to keep up his mill for the case and use of his customers. A mill not regularly established by Law, is forbidden to grind for toll. All these provisions, (and others probably might be shown,) prove that mills are highly favoured; and this is wise legislation; for, we all know, that few things contribute more to the convenience, comfort and prosperity of a country, than good mills well regulated. When a mill is to be established, application must be made to the Court of the County. They direct the Sheriff to take a Jury, who are to view the lands, &c.; and among other things, to enquire, "Whether, and in what degree, fish of passage and ordinary navigation will be obstructed; whether, by any, and by what means, such obstruction may be prevented." What is ordinary navigation? Among the meanings assigned to the word ordinary by Johnson, I find the following: established, regular, common, usual. Ordinary navigation then, is established or regular navigation. If there be such, the Jury will report it, and the means necessary to prevent its obstruction; and leave will be given to build the mill, under such conditions as will preserve the existing navigation. If there be no ordinary navigation, there can be no obstruction. The Jury will so report; and the leave to build the mill will be without any condition as to navigation; and this grant, I hold, will be a perfect one, vesting in the applicant all the public right, or so much at least as is necessary to the full enjoyment of the mill erected under the order. Proceeding under this idea, Nicholas, the owner of both banks and the bed of this 264 *private, unnavigable stream, in 1802, applied to the County Court of Buckingham, for leave to build a mill. An Inquest was held, a report made, that no navigation would be obstructed, &c. Leave was given, and the mill built, which is now owned by the Plaintiffs. The evidence shows, that this mill has proved a signal benefit to the country; and all the witnesses, who speak to that point, say, that (if they cannot have both,) they had much rather have the mill without navigation, than navigation without the mill.

After this mill had thus been in successful operation for seventeen years, a Law is passed, raising a Company for the purpose of rendering the river navigable; directing these millers (and all others, of whom there are four,) to erect locks through their dams, and keep constant attendance, to give free and ready passage; and that on failure, their dams shall be destroyed as nuisances. The evidence shows, that to build such a lock at the mill of the Plaintiffs as would answer, will cost $7,000. The cost of keeping them in order, and of giving constant attendance, is not so easily estimated. It seems probable, also, that in some seasons, the water required for the locks will interfere materially with the grinding; and upon the whole, it seems doubtful whether it would not be better for the Plaintiffs to suffer their mill to go down, than to keep it up on the terms imposed by the Law. It is the decided opinion of the witnesses, that none of the other four millers on the stream above, could afford to keep up their mills on the terms of the Law. Here then, is a Law, imposing upon the citizen a burthen, which would render his property worthless, or destroying the property in case he refuses to comply. The question forces itself upon us: Can such a Law bind? That the eminent domain of the Sovereign Power, extends to the taking private property for public purposes, I am free to admit. But then, to render the exercise of this power lawful, a fair compensation must always be made to the individual, under some equitable assessment established

265 by *Law. This is laid down by the writers on Natural Law, Civil Law, Common Law, and the Law of every civilized country. Thus Blackstone, volume 1st, p. 139, speaking of the power of the Legislature to take private property, says, "not by absolutely stripping the subject of his property in an arbitrary manner; but by giving him a full indemnification and equivalent for the injury thereby sustained. The public is now considered as an individual, treating with an individual for an exchange. All that the Legislature does, is to oblige the owner to alienate his possessions for a reasonable price; and even this is an exertion of power, which the Legislature indulges with caution, and which nothing but the Legislature can perform." Far be it from me to intimate, that the Legislature intended to violate this great principle. I am well assured that they had no such idea. They thought they were promoting the public good, without trenching at all on private right; and they may be right, and I wrong. Each of us acts under the highest sanction, and must walk by the light of our own understanding. Following this guide, I must declare it as my solemn conviction, that whether we judge this Law by the principles of all civilized Governments, by the Federal Constitution, or that of our own State, it is unconstitutional and void.

JUDGE GREEN.

I concur in what has been said, as to the preliminary questions in respect to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in a case like this, and the equity alleged by the Appellees, against the person under whom the Appellant claims.

After giving to this case, all the consideration demanded by the importance of the questions which it presents, I have been led to the conclusion, after a careful examination of the legislation of England and Virginia, from Magna Charta downwards, and resorting to all other sources
266 *of information accessible to me, that at the Common Law, as adopted here, the public have a right prima facie, notwithstanding the granting of the bed and banks to individuals, to the use of all water-courses, for the purposes of navigation, which can in any way be applied to that purpose; leaving the full use of them to the riparian owners, in any way which may be beneficial to them, until they are appropriated by the public to that object, and even afterwards, to any extent, which shall not impair the beneficial enjoyment of the public right.

It cannot however be denied, that the Sovereign Power of the State may effectually confer on individuals, by General Laws or Particular Grants, rights in opposition and paramount to this public right; and such, I think, have, by our General Laws, been vested in the owners of mills legally established, as that of the Appellants has been. This makes it unnecessary to state the grounds of my opinion as to the existence of the public right; especially as my brethren decline the consideration of that question.

That the public right, if it existed, and whatever is its nature or extent, was intended to be surrendered in favor of mills legally established, to the extent of authorising the obstruction of the stream, and the use of the water necessary for working their mills; and that with a view to the promotion of another public interest, not inferior in value to that of navigation, is, I think, clearly proved by the whole course of our legislation.

Mills have always been treated as public establishments, subject to public control in various ways; and the building of them has been encouraged by condemning the property of others, for the use of one wishing to build, and allowing him to overflow the lands of others, upon making just compensation; privileges, which were forfeited, if the mill was not kept up for the use and case of those who were customers to it. When the Legislature thus invited and encouraged individuals to vest their money in establishments so eminently useful 267 to the public, it cannot be doubted that they intended to give them an indefeasible inheritance in the property so acquired, and all its incidents and appurtenances, as complete as in the soil granted to them by their patents. This inference is fortified by the consideration, that all the Acts of Assembly of a general nature, prohibiting or directing the removal of obstructions in water-courses, uniformly except mill dams legally established. With a view to ascertain the opinion from time to time entertained by our Legislature on this point, I have examined most of the very great number of Acts of Assembly, in relation to obstructions in particular streams, used for, or devoted by Law to, the purpose of navigation, and am satisfied that the opinion of the Legislature, whenever their attention has been particularly called to the question, has conformed to that which I have expressed; although in many cases, commencing with the Act for clearing Appomattox and Pamunkey Rivers, passed in 1752, the owners of mills are required to make locks in their dams for the passage of boats, under the penalty of subjecting the dams to be abated as nuisances. Yet, there are many indications that such provisions were sometimes considered as unjust invasions of private property, and sometimes as of doubtful character. Thus the first Act directing the abatement of dams, (that of 1745, for clearing James and Appomattox Rivers, then ordinarily navigated,) required that the owners of mills on those rivers, should make convenient locks in their dams, for the passage of boats, within a limited time, under a penalty, and on failure therein, that the dams should be abated, and the owners compensated, at the expense of such counties as should be thereby benefited, and prohibited expressly the building of dams across either of those rivers in future; thus taking away, in respect to those rivers, the power vested in the County Courts by the General Laws, to give leave to build mills which required dams. It is probable, that the Courts did not so construe it, and continued to allow mills and dams to be built;

for, by an Act of January 30, 268 *1803, this prohibition is more explicitly enacted in terms. The Act of 1787, incorporating the Appomattox Company, directs the owners of dams to make and keep up locks for the purpose of boats, and to have them well attended, under pecuniary penalties; and upon failure, authorises the abatement and removal of the dams, at the expense of the owners. This is the precise prototype of the provision on the same subject of the Act of 1819, under consideration, and of most of the other Acts directing the owners of dams to make locks, &c. This provision in the Act of 1787, in respect to the dams on Appomattox River, was perfectly just, and violated no private right whatever; for, the Act of 1745, presented to the owners of mills the alternative, either to make locks, in their dams, or to submit to have them abated; in which case, a full compensation was provided for them. The owners of mills, then established, probably preferred the former alternative, or we should have seen a provision in some subsequent Act of Assembly, for making the compensation, which could not be made without a new Act. They were, therefore, under an obligation by compact, to keep up the locks which they had made, and as to all mill-dams subsequently built, they were not legally established, being built in opposition to the express prohibition of the Act of 1745, and were actually public nuisances. It was, therefore, an indulgence, not an injury, to them, to allow the dams to remain, upon condition of their making locks, &c. I am inclined to think, that the similar provisions found in subsequent Laws, were in a great degree founded on this example, upon the supposition that it was founded, not upon the particular circumstances existing in relation to that river, but upon an universal public right, preferable to those of mill-owners. I should indeed feel confident in this conjecture, but for the fact, that a similar provision was made at the same Session, in respect to mill-dams on Willis's River, with this difference only, that they were not to be abated at the expense of the owners. The Acts 269 incorporating *the James River and Potomac Companies, after authorizing the condemnation of lands for the use of the Company, and without saying any thing about mills, declare that it is not intended by those Acts to interfere with private property, but for the purpose of improving and perfecting the navigation; and prohibit the use of the water by the Company, for any purpose but that of navigation, reserving to the owners the convenience of erecting mills, forges, and other water-works.

The Act of 1794, relating to the Slate River, saves the rights of mill-owners, without intending to impair or confirm them; and the Act incorporating the Rappahannock Company provides a compensation to mill-owners, for the privilege of making locks in their dams.

I shall notice only one other of these Acts, relating to particular water-courses. An Act of 1810, declared Middle Island Creek to be a public highway, for an extent of near seventy miles, and directed that the owners of all mills already established, or that should thereafter be established thereon, should make slopes in their dams of prescribed dimensions, for the passage of boats and fish; and that, on failure thereof, the dams should be abated as public nuisances. At the next Session, on the representation of William M'Coy, the owner of a mill and dam on that creek, built before the passing of that Act, another Act was passed, which declared, that the former Act was "equivalent to the abrogation of a vested right," in respect to M'Coy's mill, and provided, that the county of Ohio should make a full compensation to him, for the injury which he might suffer by making such a slope in his dam, before it was made. This Act is the more striking since it related to a stream, whose bed and banks were declared by the Act of 1802, to belong to the public, for the common use of all, and incapable of being granted to any individual, by any prior or subsequent patent.

The Legislative interference to prevent obstructions to the passage of fish, proceeds upon a different principle.

270 *Such an obstruction violates no public right; for, the right of fishing in fresh water streams, or within the bonds of any Patent, is not public and common to all, but confined to the riparian owners; each of whom is entitled to the natural run of fish of passage upwards, as he is to the natural flow of the water downwards; and at Common Law, an assize of nuisance by the party injured, lay in such a case, as "for levying a goss to intercept the course of fish coming from the sea, usque ad gurgitem meam superiorem." Fitz. N. B. 184, A. Whilst the Legislature, therefore, might properly yield the public right of navigation to individuals for the sake of securing the public convenience of mills, they could not justly sacrifice to this object, the individual rights in respect to the natural run of fish; and therefore, have properly guarded against such obstructions to the passage of fish, by imposing it as a condition upon the leave to build a dam, that the owner shall give a free passage to fish, and seem always to have considered it as a condition implied, even when it was not expressed.

The next enquiry is, whether the Appellants' dam and mill have been legally established, or not? To the several objections made on this point by the Counsel, for the Appellees, an answer has been given on the other side, which, if true, puts an end to any further enquiry. It is insisted, that the uninterrupted enjoyment of a water-course, by obstructing or diverting it in any particular manner, for twenty years, as in this case, gives per se a perfect right to continue the use in the same way forever, and against all the world. This is true in respect to individuals, as to whose rights such a possession and use are adverse, upon the presumption that they have surrendered their rights by compact, and by analogy to the Statute of Limitation of the right of entry; the only remedies for such a wrong, the assize of nuisance or quod permittat, being in their nature possessory actions. No such presumption can arise against a public right, unless the circumstances of the case

271 *be such as to amount to a prescription, (if there can be a prescription here,) especially against a public right not in actual use and enjoyment, so that no person has an interest in opposing the encroachment upon it. As to the public right of navigation not in use, there can be no adversary possession; since, as we have seen, the riparian owner is permitted to make any use of the stream for his individual purposes, which does not interfere with the public right in actual use. Nor can any analogy to the Statutes of Limitations, apply to any public right; since they do not run, in any case, against the Commonwealth. The question then is, whether the Appellants' mill has been established according to the provisions of the Acts of Assembly upon this subject.

The first objection taken to it is, that the Order of Court giving leave to build the mill, does not, in terms, give leave to build a dam. In all our Laws in relation to the building of mills, up to that of 1785, the word dam is not to be found, except in the provision of the Act of 1705, prohibiting the building of a mill or dam within a mile below another mill on the same stream. On the contrary, the Acts of 1667, and 1705, do not even speak of leave to build a mill, but the leave to build the mill, as well as the dam, was left to be inferred from the condemnation of an acre of land, for the use of one wishing to build a mill. And, so as to the Acts of 1745 and 1748, which provide further for compensating the owners of lands, "which may be affected or laid under water by building such mill." The condemnation of the acre of land, or leave to build the mill, implied permission to build the dam, which was considered as a necessary incident; and the words mill and dam, were used as synonymous. The Act of 1785, in speaking of leave to build a mill and dam, only spoke in explicit terms, what was necessarily implied from the terms of the former Laws; and, I think, affected no change whatever in the Law. There never was a time, when any person wishing to build a mill, was under 272 any obligation *to apply to the Court, unless a dam was necessary. In all cases of leave to build a mill, or a mill and dam, the party has authority to build such a dam as he may think necessary and convenient for working the mill, unless the height of the dam is limited by Order of the Court; subject, however, to a liability under the Act of 1785, to compensate any individual injured thereby, for any damage done to him, which was not foreseen and estimated by the Jury.

The next objection is, that the Act of 1794, appointing Trustees for opening and improving the navigation of Slate River, devoted it specially to the purpose of navigation, and superseded the power of the County Court of Buckingham, under the General Laws, to grant leave to build any new mill on that river. That Act was permanent and in force, when the Court gave leave to build the Appellants' mill. The river was to be opened; and the navigation improved by means of subscriptions, which the Trustees were authorised to receive; and the Act directed the owners of mills to make and keep up locks in their dams, and to have them properly attended, if not otherwise directed by the Trustees, under a heavy penalty; and upon failing therein, that the dams should be considered as nuisances, and liable to be abated as such. It imposed penalties upon persons who should fell trees, or fix any bridges, or stop, or place any obstruction therein. It concluded, however, with these words: "saying to the owners of mills, their legal rights, which are not intended hereby to be impaired or confirmed." Under this Act, no subscriptions were received; or, if any, they were paid by contributions of labor. Some impediments were removed by labor furnished by the neighboring inhabitants, in a part of the river of four or five miles or more in extent; but the most important impediments, the great falls just above the site of the Appellants' dam, were not touched. The project of improving the navigation of the river was abandoned by the Trustees; and six or eight years after, when leave was given to build the Appellants' mill, no one in that 273 district of *country seems to have had any idea of ever making any further attempt towards its improvement. It never was in fact navigated except by one loaded, and one empty boat, by way of experiment, and upon a swell of the river; and it was, in no sense, ordinarily navigated. I do not think that this Act impaired the power of the Court to give leave to build new mills on Slate River, or made any special reservation of the public right of navigation, in respect to this particular river. Although it directs the owners of mills to make locks, &c., it expressly reserves their legal rights, referring the question as to the extent of those rights, to the Judicial Tribunals of the country; and the prohibition of other obstructions, was nothing more than enforcing, as to this particular river, by additional penalties, the general provision of the Act of 1785, in relation to all streams. The General Laws gave power to the Courts to give leave to build mills, even when the dams might obstruct ordinary navigation; imposing such terms as the Courts might think expedient for preventing such obstruction. And a fortiori, this power could not be superseded by a contemplated future navigation. The most that can be said is, that in such case, the Court, if they were apprised of the fact, and in the exercise of the discretion given them by Law, (to give or refuse leave in all cases where the mansion-house, offices, curtilage or garden, of any proprietor will not be overflowed, or the health of the neighborhood annoyed by the stagnation of the waters,) should have imposed conditions which would have operated as a reservation of the public right of future navigation; as they would no doubt have done, if any such future navigation had been known to be in contemplation; or, if any one of the Trustees, or any other, had appeared and claimed such a reservation. If, in that respect they had erred, the error might have been corrected by appeal. Their judgment in the exercise of a legitimate, and (in this particular) unlimited power, is final.

274 *Lastly, it is insisted, that a provision of the General Mill Law of 1785, which was in force when leave was given to build this mill, operated as a reservation of the public right of future navigation, in preference to the rights of the mill-owners. That provision is in these words: "The Inquest of the said Jurors, nevertheless, or Opinion of the Court, shall not bar any prosecution or action, which any person would have had in Law, had this Act never been made, other than for such injuries as were actually foreseen and estimated by the Jury." The Legislature, at the Revisal of 1819, changed the phraseology of this section, by enacting, that "no Inquest taken by virtue of this Act, or no Opinion or Judgment of the Court thereupon, shall bar any public prosecution or private action, which could have been maintained, if this Act had never been made, other than prosecutions and actions for such injuries as were actually foreseen and estimated on such Inquest." This seems to be legislative exposition of the before-mentioned provisions of the Act of 1785, rather than a new enactment; although it seems at first sight rather more comprehensive in its terms. Considering it in that light, I do not think it makes any reservation of the public right to appropriate the water and channel of the stream, to the purposes of navigation, in preference of the private right to maintain the dam, and to the use of the water for working a mill.

It may be admitted, that this provision was intended to guard in general, against any unexpected injury, either to individuals, or to the public; whether it be such as any of those, in respect to which the Jury are particularly charged to make enquiry, or any others. As if, for instance, the building of the dam should drown a mill belonging to another, or destroy a ford which was in, and a part of, a public highway; in the one case a private, in the other a public nuisance. Yet it could not be construed to extend to a future use of the stream, for the purposes of navigation; since the subject of navigation being specially in 275 the mind of the Legislature, and a provision having been made for the security of existing and ordinary navigation, whilst nothing is said in respect to future navigation, the necessary inference is, that the public rights in respect to the latter, were intended to be surrendered to the interests of individuals, for the sake of the great public interest in the establishment of mills; expressum facit cessare tacitum. And 'his seems to have been the opinion of the Legislature of 1815, indicated by the provision, that in future, every grant of leave to build a mill, should be subject to the condition, that the public should have a preferable right to the use of the water, for the purposes of navigation, and a right to make and keep a lock in the dam, (not to prostrate it,) without compensation to the owner.

The Act of 1819, incorporating the Trustees of Slate River, requires that the owners of mills shall make and keep up locks in their dams, and have them properly attended, at their own expense, forever, upon pain of pecuniary penalties, to be repeated in infinitum: and of their dams being considered as public nuisances, and abated by the Company at the expense of the owners. It manifestly impairs their rights, both in respect to the keeping up of their dams, and the use of the water for working their mills, in preference of the public right to use the channel and water of the stream, for the purposes of navigation.

The last enquiry, therefore, presented by this cause, is, whether the Court has a legal authority to declare so much of the Act of 1819, as impairs the private rights of the Appellants without compensation, to be void, as being in violation of the Constitution of our own State, or that of the United States.

A very liberal construction has been given to the clause of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits any State to pass any Law impairing the obligation of contracts. It has, however, never been extended to the protection of private rights, acquired under the operation of the General Laws of the State, and without 276 out any consideration *given, beyond the general purposes of promoting individual interests directly, and the interests of the community incidentally. Nor do I think it can be justly extended to the protection of rights so acquired.

The Legislature of the State is declared by our Constitution to be a complete Legislature, and consequently has all the powers of Sovereignty, except so far as they are limited by the Constitutions of Virginia and the United States. Our Bill of Rights is a part of our Constitution; and the general principles thereby declared are Fundamental Laws, except so far as they are modified by the Constitution itself. They limit the powers of the Legislature, and prohibit the passing any Law violating those principles. The first Article of this declares: "That all men are by nature free and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot by any compact deprive or divest their posterity, namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety." To deprive a citizen of any property already legally acquired, without a fair compensation, deprives him quoad hoc, of the means of possessing property, and of the only means, so far as the Government is concerned, besides the security of his person, of obtaining happiness. Liberty itself consists essentially, as well in the security of private property, as of the persons of individuals; and this security of private property is one of the primary objects of Civil Government, which our ancestors, in framing our Constitution, intended to secure to themselves and their posterity, effectually, and for ever.

The Legislature, in passing the Act of 1819, did not intend to invade private rights, but proceeded, no doubt, upon the belief that the rights of the owners of mills generally, were subordinate to the public right of navigation, and particularly in respect to the Slate River; a question, on which there may well be a difference 277 of opinion. The Constitution, *however, declares, that the Legislative and Judicial Departments, shall be distinct and separate; so that, neither shall exercise the powers properly belonging to the other. The questions, whether the rights of the owners of mills, or of the public, for the purposes of navigation, are preferred by Law generally, or in any particular case, are emphatically Judicial in their nature, depending on the effect and construction of former Laws; and, if upon a full and careful consideration, we conscientiously differ in opinion in any partical case from the Legislature, we are bound by the highest obligations of duty to ourselves and our country, to pursue our own judgment.

I think the order of the Chancellor should be reversed, the Injunction re-instated, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded in, in order to a final Decree.

JUDGE COALTER.

Many topics of great magnitude and interest, as well to the Commonwealth, as individuals, have been presented by the argument in this case, many of them requiring deep research and reflection.

Borne down, as this Court is, by the great mass of business on the docket, and considering that three-fourths, or more, of our time is occupied in the mere drudgery of sifting out and ascertaining matters of fact, and in examining matters of account, without the aid of a Jury, or Master Commissioner to assist us, I think, in most cases, and especially in such as that before us, we ought to confine ourselves to the fewest points of enquiry on which the case can be safely decided.

The controversy arises under the Act of Assembly, passed the 29th of January, 1819, (Sessions Acts of 1818, ch. 27,) for improving the navigation of Slate River. By that Act, a Company is incorporated to improve the navigation of that river; and for that purpose, certain powers are given them. At the passage of this Act, it 278 was well known, as the fact was, that several mills had been erected on that river, and were then in use; and the 10th section of the Act provides, that the owners of these mills, and every of them, shall, within six months after the navigation shall have been completed to the said mills, erect good and sufficient locks, and keep them in good repair, &c., and cause constant attendance to be given to them, &c., under a penalty of $20 for every failure, &c. And the 11th section provides, that if any owner of a mill shall refuse or fail to build such locks within eighteen months, then the dam is declared a nuisance, and may be abated and thrown down at the expense of the owner.

It appears that the Company, instead of beginning below, and improving the navigation to the first mill, which is that of the Appellant, and which would have cost but a small sum, and then calling on him to build the locks, and on failure, proceeding to prostrate the dam, so as to bring up this question, so important to themselves, and the owners of the mills, for decision, before much expense was incurred; proceeded to expend considerable sums, to the amount of some four or five thousand dollars, in improving the upper parts of the river. This was an unfortunate course, should it be decided that the owners of mills are not obliged to build locks; for in that case, this money must be lost, unless the Company can be permitted, and will incur the expense of erecting the locks themselves; and shall be entitled to water enough to work them.

The facts proved by the evidence in this record, present a case of a very peculiar character, as it regards the public interest, apart from the rights and interests of the individuals who are before the Court.

It appears from the testimony of about seventeen witnesses, the greater part of whom reside on, or near the river, and who are from fifty to seventy years of age, that this river passes through a bold and hilly country, and has many rapids and falls in it, some of considerable, others of minor extent and magnitude, which hitherto 279 formed, *what had been considered insuperable obstructions to its navigation: that some fifty years ago and upwards, efforts had been made to remove some of these obstructions, but in vain, that after this, and in consequence of an Act of Assembly, passed about the year 1794, further efforts were made by voluntary associations of labor, &c.; but the thing was finally considered on all hands, as impracticable, and was abandoned. From that time, until since the Act of 1819, no further efforts had been made.

It also appears, that one Nicholas, the then proprietor of the site on which the Appellants' mill stands, had a mill at that place, as early as the year 1765, which was in operation during the Revolution, and perhaps for some time after; but, that it had gone down. In July, 1802, Robert Nicholas, his son and devisee, obtained an Order of Court to build a mill at the same place, and having, in September of that year, conveyed to Charles A. Scott, he proceeded to build the dam and mill, at an expense of nearly $20,000; and in 1807, sold it to Cunningham for the sum last mentioned, under whose heir at Law the Appellants claim.

In the mean time, also, and before the Act of 1819, four other mills have been erected, at what expense does not appear; but, considering the height of their dams, and the public utility which seems to be ascribed to them by the witnesses, it is not presumable that they can be worth less in the aggregate, than from $20,000 to $25,000. All these witnesses agree, that these mills are of much greater utility to the public, than the navigation of the river; and that if one or the other must give way, the mills ought to stand. They give the most conclusive reasons for this opinion; and, what is remarkable, neither the opinion, nor the reasons for it, are contradicted by a single witness on the other side. They all concur too, in the opinion, that the owners of neither of them, unless indeed, by possibility, the Appellant, would be justified, if they were able, to advance the money in building the locks required 280 by *the Act. The estimate of Mr.

Randolph Harrison, the former Superintendent of the James River Improvements, as I understand him, would make the costs of the locks necessary to be erected at the Appellants' mill, about $7,000. If this, or any thing like it be correct, when we consider the risque, the necessary repairs, the expense of a lock-keeper, and the interest of the money, it cannot be supposed that he would be so imprudent as to encounter this expense; and the more especially, if the use of the locks should deprive his mill of the necessary supply of water during the Autumn, a season of the year so important to millers. The inevitable result, as seems to be anticipated by these witnesses, is, that for a navigation, by no means good, all these mills, and all this private property, must be sacrificed, and the country left to suffer for the want of bread, besides being deprived of a market, a very good one too as they state, for their grain and various other articles, which is now found at those mills. It seems too, that the ponds of these mills, being, of course, made at the most considerable falls, cover perhaps nearly, if not altogether, one half of the whole fall of the river; although they cover, comparatively, but a small proportion of its bed. The witnesses, in speaking of those falls, describe most of them as rapid, abounding in large rocks, which would have to be blasted; and many of them, and amongst the number Mr. Kandolph Harrison, think, as I understand them, that the style of improvement adopted on the other parts of the river, will not answer for these places; and especially, that covered by the Appellants' mill, and the one immediately above it.

The height of the Appellants' dam is about eighteen feet; that of the mill next above it, about thirteen feet; and there are contiguous rapids to them of about eleven or twelve feet; making a total fall, as well as I understand the testimony, of about forty-two feet in about three miles. If, then, these dams are prostrated, and the other kind of improvement will not answer 281 the purposes of navigation, "the very dams now standing, must be again resorted to, or the work, to all useful purposes, given up.

But again, I collect from the evidence, that the aggregate height of all the dams is above fifty-eight feet; and that of the sluice dams, built by the Company, about fifty-seven feet. Thus, if those dams stand, and the locks are made and kept up by the owners, with lock-keepers, &c., the owners of mills will, at their expense, overcome one-half, and much the most difficult half, of the obstructions to the navigation, and keep it up forever, for the benefit of the Company!

Nevertheless, and however unjust to the individuals, or injurious to the public, it may be; and however truthless the procedure on the part of this body politic towards those individuals; if it was competent for the Legislature to pass the Act of 1819, it is competent for them alone to retract their Act, and put a stop to the mischief, by compensating the Company for their expenses, and re-instating both the public and private interests where they were before the Act of 1819; unless indeed, the Company should elect to make locks, and use them whenever there shall be water enough, both for them and the mill.

The question, then, between these parties, arises on conflicting Acts of the Legislature, under which, both parties have acquired rights; the various Acts concerning mills, on the one hand, and the Act of 1819, above referred to, on the other.

I will not, in this case, consider, or give any opinion, which may bear on the question, how far a mill dam, authorised to be built across a stream on which there has been ordinary navigation of some kind or other, and where the Inquest has found that no such navigation is obstructed, or the Court has been careless in imposing proper conditions, shall be subject to the resumption, at any time, by the public, of her right to the navigation. Nor will I pass any opinion, as to the effect of the Act of 1815, in regard to its prospective operation on individual rights;

282 "being satisfied, that it can in no way affect the rights, whatever they may be, which were previously acquired by the Appellant. Nor will I at all be understood, as having formed any opinion on the question, how far the owner of the bed of a stream having no ordinary navigation on it, but which may hereafter be used for the purposes of navigation, either as a feeder of a canal, or by dams erected across it, shall be deprived, without compensation, of a fall and site for water-works on his land, on the ground, that before he shall have actually occupied it, as such, the public has occupied it, or is about to occupy it, as aforesaid, for navigation, whether such occupation is claimed by the public under the Act of 1815, or independently of it; the owner of this land having acquired his Patent previous to the Act of 1815. All these, and many others, are questions of deep interest, not arising in this case, and not necessary, in my humble opinion, to be decided at this time.

This case simply presents the question, whether the owner of a mill can be thus disturbed, he having erected the mill under an Order of Court, duly granted in the year 1802, to him who holds under a Patent of a very early date, granting the land, not bounded by the stream of water, but running across it, so as to convey it, water and all, so far as such a Patent can convey the public right to the water, of a stream too, on which there never was any ordinary navigation, and on which, particularly at this place, extraordinary navigation cannot exist, without the aid of dams of some kind, and perhaps of the very kind of that now erected, and in which the claim of the public to this extraordinary navigation has been asserted, long after the mill was so erected.

Not wishing, in this case, as I have before stated, to discuss or decide on the public right to have used this mill-site for purposes of navigation, in exclusion of the owner of the land, had this actual claim on the part of the public been consistent with the application of the owner for 283 "an Order to erect his mill, I may at present, and without prejudice to that question, take it for granted, that an assertion of that public right, if made at that time, would have postponed the individual right; at least, so far as the necessary use of the water itself for the purposes of navigation, leaving it to the individual to elect whether he would use the residue of the water, not so necessary to navigation, for his own purposes.

Be this as it may, the Legislature had an undoubted right to abridge or modify this public right, if it existed, either by Special Acts, in each particular case, or by some general provision and regulation; especially with a view to promote the public interest in any other way.

In looking, then, to the course of legislation in regard to mills, we find them, at all times, treated of as improvements beneficial to the public. Their tolls are regulated; millers exempted from other public services, &c. &c.; and the public right to the water is only noticed, so far as regards the passage of fish, and ordinary navigation. The right to condemn the lands of others, is granted, which could only be on the ground of public utility, no right existing, by our institutions, to condemn the private property of one man to the use of another, merely on the ground that he will make a better use of it.

The Appellant's right to the use of this water, in exclusion of the extraordinary navigation authorised by the Act of 1819, if it did not exist under his Patent, is undoubtedly secured to him under those Acts; and even if there was any irregularity in the form of the Order of Court granting the leave to erect the mill and dam, that Order has never been revised by a regular proceeding, and could not, I apprehend, be now reversed here. But I see no substantial objection to it. If his rights, thus acquired, are to be invaded for public purposes, it can only be done on the principle of making him compensation. The use of the pond, merely for navigation, I am not prepared to say ought not to be occupied by the public, although the 284 Company are saved the expense of erecting the dam, which creates that pond. Perhaps, this question cannot be said to arise in this case.

How far the erection of a lock in the dam by the Company, may injure the owner of the mill, by rendering his dam less secure, is a question also, which does not seem to be in issue; nor indeed, the right of the Company to use any water for their locks, which may produce an injury to the mill. But as to the latter, it may not be impertinent to say, that the principles on which I decide this case, go to secure the mill-owner against any such injury.

I think, therefore, that the Decree must be reversed.

JUDGE CABELL.

The question as to the nature and extent of the public rights to the use of water-courses, for the purposes of navigation, is one of the greatest importance to the community. But I do not deem it at all necessary to be decided in this case; and therefore I shall give no opinion upon it. Whatever those rights may be, it is competent to the Legislature to relinquish them to individuals, in any mode, and for any purpose, that they may think proper. I concur in the opinion expressed by the other Judges, that whatever rights may have belonged to the public, in relation to the navigation of Slate River, at the site of the Appellant's mill-dam, were relinquished by the Order of Buckingham Court, establishing that mill. And that the rights acquired under that Order, by the owners of the mill, cannot be invaded, even for public purposes, without just compensation.

I concur in reversing the Decree of the Chancellor, and re-instating the Injunction.

Deeds of Trust*—Impeachment—Matter Ex Post Facto.—If a Deed of Trust be fairly executed to secure a just debt, it cannot be impeached for fraud, for any matter or ex post facto.

Same—Sale under—Effect as to Grantor's Creditors.—If a Deed of Trust be fair, and the sale under it be fair also, the Sheriff who levies an Execution (issued against the goods and chattels of the debtor in the Deed,) on the property so fairly sold, and in the possession of the purchaser, is a trespasser, and in action will lie against him.

Same*—Fraudulent Sale under—Effect as to Grantors and Creditors.—And if the sale be fraudulent, (so as to render the sale void as between the purchaser, or cestuy qui trust, and the creditors of the original debtor,) yet the Deed being good, it still operates to shield the property (conveyed for the benefit of the cestuy qui trust) from the Execution of the creditors of the original debtor: In other words, it operates as effectually to prevent an Execution from being levied on the property as if there had been no sale.

Same—Security for Debt—Surplus Rights of Grantor's and Creditors &c.—If A. makes a fair Deed of Trust to secure the payment of a just debt to B. the property conveyed is first liable to pay the debt of B.; and if any surplus remains after paying that debt, and executing the trust, that surplus is a fund to which the creditors of A. have a right to resort, but it cannot be reached by Execution before a sale under the Deed; because it is an equitable and contingent interest.

Evidence—Declarations of Confederate.—If two persons combine to effect a given object, in an action against one of the confederates, the declarations of the other, who is not a party to the suit, may be given in evidence as a part of the res gesta. By two Judges. (CARR and GREEN.)

Same—Impeachment—Matters Ex Post Facto.—A conveyance not fraudulent in its inception cannot become so by matters subsequent, for the statute requires that the act should be done with a criminal intent; still, if it be afterwards employed for a fraudulent purpose, a court of equity will interpose to prevent such use of it. Evidence—Admissibility Dependent on Preliminary Facts—How Admissibility Determined.—As it is the province of the jury to consider what degree of credit ought to be given to evidence, so it is for the court alone to determine, whether a witness is competent, or the evidence is admissible. Whether there is any evidence is a question for the judge; whether it is sufficient is for the jury. And whatever antecedent facts are necessary to be ascertained, for the purpose of deciding the question of competency, as for example, whether a child understands the nature of an oath, or whether the confession of a prisoner was voluntary, or whether declarations offered in evidence as dying declarations, were made under the immediate apprehension of death; these and other facts of the same kind, are to be determined by the court, and not by the jury. Vass v. Com., 8 Leigh 794, quoting these those preliminary facts must be decided by the Court. Thus, whether the declarations of a confederate be competent, depends on the previous fact of a combination, or confederacy between the witness and the party, and the Court must decide that fact, to enable it to judge whether the evidence be admissible or not. Conveyance of Personality—Possession Retained by Grantor—Effect.—The question, whether, in case of an absolute Deed for personal property, and the possession remaining with the grantor, such inconsistent possession be fraudulent per se. Investigated by GREEN J.

Mark Anthony, brought Trespass in the Superior Court of Bedford, against John Claytor, Sheriff of Bedford, for taking and carrying away, and selling, by colour of his office, a slave of the name of Patrick, the property of the Plaintiff.

One William Trigg, had, by Deed of Trust dated 16th May, 1810, conveyed to Thomas Norvell and William 286 *Mitchell, as Trustees, a number of slaves, and amongst others, the slave Patrick, in the Declaration mentioned, to secure the payment of a large sum of money to James C. Anthony. The Deed authorized the Trustees jointly to make the sale on default of payment, at the request of the creditor.

At the trial, on the general issue the Defendant filing a Bill of Exceptions to the opinion of the Court, stating, that the Plaintiff gave in evidence the Deposition of William Mitchell, who proved, that he alone, at the request of the creditor, James C. Anthony, and by authority of Trigg, the debtor, advertised and sold twelve of the negroes in the Deed mentioned, on the 23d May, 1812; that Patrick was one of them, who was sold for $253 50, to Mark Anthony, the Plaintiff, and that the Dependent executed a Bill of Sale for him: and that the whole sale amounted to $2,757 50; of which $2,650 29, were paid to J. C. Anthony's order in favor of Mark Anthony, and $5 50 reserved for expenses of the trust; that the amount due under the Trust Deed was $2,655 79; which debt was acknowledged by Trigg, on the day of sale, to be justly due to James C. Anthony. On his cross-examination, he said that Mark Anthony paid no money, but the creditor, James C. Anthony, directed the proceeds of sale to be paid over to him: that he had heard Mark Anthony say, that he had remitted a large sum of money to J. C. Anthony, by mail, but heard nothing from the said James, on the subject. Being asked whether he knew any thing in relation to the payment, previous to the sale made by him, of the debt due by W. Trigg to J. C. Anthony, by means of money got from Charles Clay, he said he knew of no payment made by W. Trigg to J. C. Anthony, before the sale, but recollects, that a few days before he was informed of the remittance aforesaid, he saw a large sum in Bank notes, which seemed to be passing from C. Clay to Mark Anthony, and he thinks the latter informed him that he received the remittance before mentioned from C. Clay.

287 *The Bill of Exceptions further states the evidence of James Austin, who proves, that in the year 1811, before the sale under the Deed of Trust, the Plaintiff and Trigg, obtained two bonds from the said J. Austin and John Anthony, executed to the Plaintiff, for the purpose of disposing of them, to relieve the negroes of Trigg, from the Deed of Trust, and that the Plaintiff and Trigg, to indemnify the said Austin and John Anthony, from the said bonds, executed a Deed of Trust, bearing date 26th August, 1811, conveying sundry slaves of Trigg's, amongst whom was Patrick, and a tract of land and sundry slaves of Mark Anthony's. It states that it appeared in evidence, that a large sum of money was raised by the sale of the bonds, but how much did not appear, nor that it was applied to the discharge of the debt due under the Deed of Trust; but that Mark Anthony made considerable advances to James C. Anthony, about this time, he being much indebted in him: it appeared also, that the Plaintiff afterwards discharged the said bonds himself.

It further appeared, that after sale by Mitchell, under the Deed of Trust, the negroes were returned to the plantation on which Trigg lived, being a plantation which the Plaintiff had rented that year from another person, and it did not appear during that year that the said Anthony at all interfered with the management of the said negroes, but it was proved, that the Plaintiff rented the land on which Trigg lived for the years 1811-12 and 13, and in the latter year the Plaintiff employed an overseer for the estate on which said Trigg lived, and placed under him the slaves sold under the Deed of Trust, none of whom were subject to the control of said Trigg, but were entirely subject to the Plaintiff and his overseer, from whose possession

Same—Effect. Where Possession Changes before Rights of Creditors Attach.—In Sydnor v. Gee, 4 Leigh 585, the last headnote is to the effect that, if an absolute sale of chattels, fair in itself, be not accompanied and followed by immediate possession, but possession is taken by the vendor before the rights of any creditor of the vendor attaches, the sale is good against the vendor's creditors. In this case TUCKER, P. says (p. 549): "According to the view I have taken of the case, it is unnecessary to examine the interesting question, which has been so ably argued, as to the effect of the subsequent acquirement of possession by the vendee upon intervening rights of third persons. This question has been touched by one of the Judges of this court in Claytor v. Anthony, 6 Rand. 305, and by another in Batton v. Glasscock, 6 Rand. 78, and is mentioned and waived in the recent case of Shields v. Anderson, 8 Leigh 785, 7. But it may not be amiss to say, that it is strongly my impression, that the failure to deliver possession where there is no real fraud intended, does not attach fraud to the transaction forever; and that a subsequent delivery will make it valid and effectual, against all creditors, whose debts are contracted, and all purchasers whose bargains are made after such subsequent delivery. The taking possession will at least make it the same thing as if the deed was then made. See the remarks of BAYLEY, J. in Jones v. Dwyer, 15 East 27, 8. Farther than this I am not disposed at this time to go; but shall be free to re-examine the question in other aspects, whenever it shall again arise."

To the same effect the principal case is cited in Shields v. Anderson, 8 Leigh 787.

the negro in question was taken by the Defendant.

It also appeared, that said Trigg continued to live upon the land aforesaid, and used some corn, the product thereof, for the support of his family, though this was against the consent of the Plaintiff, and his overseer.

288 *The slave in the Declaration mentioned, after being sold under the Deed of Trust, was sold by the Defendant, acting as Sheriff, as the property of Trigg, under an Execution sued out against him, in behalf of one Creery.

It further appeared, that Trigg was much in debt, and the brother-in-law of the Plaintiff.

This being the state of the facts, the Defendant introduced Mr. Leftwich, to prove that he attended the sale under the Deed of Trust, with the intent of purchasing one of the slaves included in the said Deed; "that he was taken out by Trigg, who requested the witness not to bid for the slaves, the said Trigg stating that the Plaintiff was to buy the property for him the said Trigg." This evidence was objected to, and the Court sustained the objection, unless it could be shewn that the Plaintiff was privy to Trigg's statement, or in other manner assented to it, and the evidence was not heard. The Defendant therefore excepted.

The second Bill of Exceptions stated, that after the introduction of the evidence set forth in the first Bill, the Counsel for the Defendant contended before the Jury, that if they should be satisfied from the evidence, that the slave in the Proceedings mentioned, was permitted by the Plaintiff to remain in the possession of Trigg, after the sale by the Trustee, as before set forth, such possession on the part of Trigg, was per se fraudulent, and that during such possession the said slave was liable to the creditors of the said Trigg; but the Court stopped the Counsel, and instructed the Jury, that if the sale of the said slave had been made by the said Trigg, to the said Anthony, and Trigg had afterwards been permitted by said Anthony to remain in possession of the slave, it would have been fraudulent per se, and would have subjected said slave to the creditors of Trigg; but that if the Jury should be satisfied from the evidence that the said slave was sold by the Trustee, and possession thereof delivered to the Plaintiff, and a Deed therefor made by the Trustee to the said Anthony, and that afterwards possession of said slave was permitted by 289 *the said Anthony to be with the said Trigg, during part of the year 1812, such possession on the part of said Trigg, was not per se fraudulent, so as to subject said slave to the creditors of Trigg, in the year 1813, when the Plaintiff had the actual possession of the slave in question: if the Jury shall be satisfied by the evidence, that the Plaintiff had the actual possession at the time when the trespass complained of is alleged to have been committed: And the Court further said, that it did not consider such possession of Trigg, in 1812, to be fraudulent per se, so as to subject said slave to the demand of Trigg's creditors, by Execution, even if the Execution had been levied in 1812, which was not this case; but the Jury might consider Trigg's possession in 1812, as a circumstance of fraud in this case. To which opinions and instruction, the Defendant excepted, and appealed to this Court.

March 29. The Judges delivered their opinions.*

JUDGE CARR.

This case comes up on two Exceptions taken to Opinions of the Court below. William Trigg, being indebted to James C. Anthony between two and three thousand dollars, executed to him a Deed of Trust on twelve negroes as a security for the debt: an advertisement and sale took place under the Deed of trust; and Mark Anthony a brother of James and brother-in-law of Trigg, became the purchaser of all the slaves for the sum of $2,747 50, overgoing the debt and interest due on the Deed $97 21. The Trustee executed a Bill of Sale to the purchaser, and the slaves were returned to the possession of Trigg, 290 who lived *on a tract of land then rented by the purchaser. The sale took place May 23d, 1812, and the slaves remained with Trigg for the rest of the year. In the beginning of the next year, they were taken by Anthony from the possession of Trigg, and placed under his own overseer; still, however, on the same plantation where they had lived the last year, which Anthony had again rented, and on which Trigg continued to reside. On the 28th of January, 1813, an Execution issued from the Office of Bedford county, in the name of Pleasant Creery against Trigg, and was levied on one of the slaves bought by Anthony under the Deed of Trust, and then in possession of his overseer. The Sheriff returned, levied and not time to sell; a venditioni issued, and was returned satisfied. Anthony brought trespass against the Sheriff for seizure and sale of the slave. The Defence was placed on the ground of fraud, not in the origin of the transaction, (for, it seems agreed on all hands, that the Deed was fairly executed to secure a just debt,) but in the sale under the Deed. The first effort of the Defendant was to prove, that for some time previous to the sale, Mark Anthony and Trigg were united in a common design to protect the property of Trigg (who was deeply in debt,) from his creditors; that to this end, they in 1811, borrowed of James Austin and John Anthony two bonds, executed by them to Mark Anthony for 450l. each, with the avowed purpose of raising money on them, to relieve Trigg's negroes from the Deed to J. C. Anthony; that to secure these bonds, they executed a Deed of Trust on Trigg's slaves, (included in the first Deed,) and on several slaves, &c. of M. Anthony; that a considerable sum of money was raised on the bonds, and that Mark Anthony remitted money to James C. Anthony; but how much was not proved, nor that it was on account of Trigg's debt, Mark Anthony being also in debt to J. C.

*The PRESIDENT absent.

Anthony. That on the day of sale, Mark Anthony appeared as a creditor of James C. Anthony, having an order from him for the whole proceeds of the sale, though he *was, not long before, his debtor. That though the Deed of Trust was made to two Trustees, who were to act jointly, yet when only one appeared on the day of sale, Trigg removed the difficulty, by giving him a written power to proceed alone. These facts being proved, the Defendant offered to examine a witness, to prove that he had attended with the intention of buying one of the slaves, but was taken out by Trigg, and requested not to bid for them; for, that Mark Anthony was to buy the property for him. This evidence being objected to, the Court sustained the objection, unless it could be shown, that Mark Anthony was privy, or in some way assented, to Trigg's statement. I think this evidence ought to have been admitted. It is laid down in many cases, that "a community of interest or design, will frequently make the declarations of one, the declarations of all." (See 2 Stark. on Evid. 44, and the cases there cited.) And this is not confined to contracts, but extends to trespasses, and even crimes of the highest grade. (See Stark. on Evid. 47, and the cases.) In the case before us, the Court had to judge for itself, whether such a community of purpose, between Trigg and Anthony, was proved, as laid a proper ground for admitting the declarations of one, to be evidence against the other. I think there was such proof, and therefore, that the evidence should not have been rejected. There is another ground. A transaction consists often of various parts, which, connected together, form the whole. Thus, in the question of fraud, you can hardly ever establish it by direct and positive proof. You must collect the acts, circumstances and declarations of the parties concerned. So far as these form a part, and assist in giving character to the transaction, they are good evidence. Such facts, declarations, &c. are called part of the res gesta. Thus, when the character of a particular act is questioned, the declaration of the party doing it, made at the moment, is evidence to explain it. As in the case of bankruptcy, the declaration of the bankrupt, made when leaving his house, is evidence to explain the *meaning of his absenting himself. On the same ground, it was held in Lord George Gordon's Case, that the cry of the mob might be received as part of the transaction. In these cases, the weight of the evidence does not depend on the credit of the witness, but on its connection with the circumstances. (See 2 Stark. on Evid. 46-7-8.) In the case before us, a public sale of twelve negroes had been advertised to be sold at a certain place in the Town of Lynchburg. This would naturally collect people, and we know from the record, that some did attend besides the immediate parties. Yet, we hear of no bidder but Mark Anthony. It is natural to ask, how this happened? Suppose it could be proved, that there were twenty persons present, and that each of them had been requested by Trigg not to bid, because Mark Anthony was to buy for him. Would not this account for the fact, and go far to give a character to the transaction? Look, too, at the situation of Trigg. He was the owner of the slaves, deeply interested, (if the sale was real,) in raising up bidders, and enhancing the price of every slave. Does not such a man hold an important station in such a transaction? And are not his acts and declarations, done and made at the moment, during the progress of the sale, a very material part of it? The very sale itself would not have been made by one Trustee, without his leave. I think then, on both these grounds, the evidence was clearly admissible. The second exception is, on account of an instruction, given by the Court to the Jury. That was to this effect, that if Trigg had individually sold the slave to Anthony, and had afterwards remained in possession, this would have been fraud per se; but that if the slave was sold by the Trustee, under the Deed, delivered by him to the purchaser Anthony, and a Deed made to him, and afterwards suffered by Anthony to remain in possession of Trigg for the year 1812: This was not per se fraudulent, "so as to subject said slave to the creditors of Trigg in the year 1813, if then, in the actual possession of Anthony."

293 *I do not consider this instruction as raising the simple question of fraud per se, decided in Edwards v. Harben, and many other cases; but, admitting that doctrine as settled, the Court considered this case an exception, and that is the point for our consideration. For my view of the general doctrine of fraud per se, I refer to my opinion in the case of Land v. Jeffries, 5 Rand. 211, with the single remark in addition, that I agree fully to the rule of Edwards v. Harben, "That the absolute transfer of personal chattels without a delivery of possession, is in Law fraud per se;" but, I add, that this being a legal presumption, is not absolutely conclusive as to fraud, but may be explained; and where this explanation is satisfactory to prove the perfect fairness of the transaction, and that the inconsistency of title and possession formed no part of the original contract, the case is taken out of the rule, and I refer to 2 Stark. on Evid. 617-18-19-20, and the cases there, to show that I am supported in this position by that excellent writer, and also by some of the ablest Judges who have sat on the English Bench. Passing the general question by: The opinion of the Court below presents two points interesting and important in their character. 1st. Does the sale of a slave by a Trustee under a Deed of Trust, and a delivery of possession by him to the buyer with a Bill of Sale, so change the property, that the buyer may suffer the slave to return to the possession of the former owner, without danger of coming within the rule of Edwards v. Harben? 2d. If possession of the slave do not accompany and follow the conveyance, but yet the purchaser takes possession before the issuing an Execution by a creditor of the vendor, can such Execution be levied on the property in possession of the purchaser? I would not be understood to give a decided opinion on either of these points, because I think the cause may be decided without it; but, on the first, (as it was discussed at the Bar, and will, I understand, be noticed by some of my brethren,) I will give my present impressions.

294 In Kidd v. Rawlinson, 2 *Bos. & Pull. 59, it is decided, that if A. buy the goods of B., sold by a Sheriff under an Execution, he may suffer them to remain in possession of B., without subjecting them to B's creditors. The circumstances distinguishing this from Twyne's Case, seem, 1st. The publicity of the sale: 2dly. That the purchaser was not a creditor: 3d. That the sale was not by the party himself, but by the Sheriff. "The object of the Statute (as is well observed by Starkie, 2 vol. 620,) was to prevent covinous and fraudulent sales by the owner to the prejudice of creditors, and not, as it seems, to sales made by a third person, as a Sheriff under an Execution, or a Landlord under a Distress, without proof of some fraud or collusion on the part of the owner, which in effect, makes such a sale his own act." The case of Guthrie et al. v. Wood, 1 Starkie's Cases, 367; 2 C. L. R. 430; was shortly this: Eastman a packer, assigned the goods in question to W., as Trustee for H.; to secure the payment of an annuity sold by E. to H: remaining in possession, he afterwards assigned his counting-house, fixtures, and utensils in trade, to Guthrie and others, for the benefit of his creditors. E. remained in possession of the goods, and Pearson, the Landlord, sent in a Distress for rent, and the goods in question were sold under the Distress, and purchased by Guthrie with the funds of the creditors, for whom he was Trustee, and for their account. The goods were still suffered to remain in possession of Eastman, and they were seized under an Execution at the suit of W., as Trustee for H., and Guthrie brought trover against Wood, to recover their value. After argument by Scarlet and Spankie, for the Plaintiffs. Marryatt and Comyn, for the Defendant, Lord Ellenborough said, "I had supposed that evidence would have been given of some collusion on the part of Pearson, the Landlord, with the Plaintiff; but nothing of this kind appears. The Plaintiffs acquired a property in the goods by purchasing them at the sale under the Distress. Guthrie, as a Trustee, was not on that account

295 precluded from *becoming a purchaser; he purchased them as any other person might have done; and though he had taken the money with which he purchased them from the strong box of another, that would not have vitiated the sale. His motive for buying was, that the goods might not be removed from the premises, but might remain there for the benefit of the creditors, and he was quite at liberty, if he chose, to leave Eastman in the possession. The doctrine of possession applies to cases of conveyance from the party himself. The Statute of Eliz. does not apply to a case like this, where the property is sold not by the party, but under a Distress for rent." See also, Meggot v. Mills, 1 Lord Raym. 286; Cole v. Davies, Id. 724;

Watkins v. Birch, 4 Taunt. 823; Steel v. Brown, 1 Taunt. 381. These are most of them cases under Executions, or Distress warrants, but the following comes nearer to the question before us. Leonard v. Baker, 1 Mau. & Sel. 251: One Clee, the husband of the Plaintiff's mother, assigned his effects to Trustees for the benefit of creditors, and absconded, leaving his wife in possession of his house, and goods at Pershore, and notice of such assignment was advertised in the newspaper, and the goods were afterwards sold by the Trustees, at public auction; and the Plaintiff purchased them in order to accommodate his mother, and paid for them at a fair valuation, and removed some, but left the greater part in her possession, she continuing to reside in the house, and take in lodgers as before, and at the ensuing Michaelmas, he also took the house of the Landlord, at an advanced rent. In the December following Collin's Execution was levied on the goods, when the Plaintiff gave notice to the Sheriff, that the goods were his property, under the appraisement and sale, which was the first time that Collins was apprised of that circumstance. The Plaintiff brought Trover against the Sheriff. The Judge at Nisi Prius, left it to the Jury to consider: 1st. Whether the change of property by the assignment, and subsequent sale made to the Plaintiff, was notorious at Per-

296 shore; upon *which the Jury found in the affirmative: And 2dly. Whether the assignment had been executed with an intent to defeat either the general body of creditors, or any particular creditor: The Jury found in the negative, whereupon, a verdict was found for the Plaintiff. Jervis moved to set aside the verdict, and enter a non-suit, on the ground that it was improperly left to the Jury to say, whether the change of property was notorious, there being no evidence of any change of property at all; inasmuch as Clee's wife was suffered to continue in possession of the goods, after the assignment to the Trustees, and after the sale to the Plaintiff, precisely in the same manner as before. The Court were unanimous against the motion. Lord Ellenborough said, "I think the verdict is according to the law and the facts, as they appeared to the Jury. As to the point respecting the change of property; what was done respecting it, was not done secretly, but the Trust Deed was known and advertised in the public papers; and the sale under it was by public auction. The Trustees, indeed, for a time allow the wife to continue in possession after the assignment; and do not themselves interfere with the goods by removing them, except on occasion of the man's coming in and taking away the saw; which, however, is a circumstance in the case, although I do not much rely upon it; but when the sale took place, the Plaintiff removed a part of the goods, and the rest only he suffered to remain with his mother for her accommodation. At all events, an effectual change took place in September, when the house was re-taken by the Plaintiff, at an advanced rent; but it seems to me, there was a bona fide change before that time: to hold otherwise would be to pronounce that a person could not make a bona fide purchase of goods in the possession of another for his accommodation, and for the purpose of continuing them in the same possession." This seems to me a very strong case, and accords with my ideas of sound reason, and the meaning of the Statute. Where a fair, open, public 297 sale of a man's property is made "by a third person, whether as Sheriff, Bailiff or Trustee, it never could be the intention of the Statute to prevent a friend from buying as the highest bidder, paying his money, and then leaving the property with the former owner. Deeds of Trust, with us, "take effect as to subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice, and as to all creditors, from the time when such Deeds shall have been acknowledged, proved, or certified according to Law, and delivered to the Clerk of the proper county to be recorded," and this Court has, in many cases, laid it down that the Trustee is the agent of both parties: leaving, therefore, the questions of fraud and collusion to depend on the evidence, and to be decided by the Jury in each particular case, I think that as a general question of Law, we may pronounce, that a fair sale, under a fair Deed of Trust, does so change the property, that the purchaser may permit it to return to, and remain with the former owner, without subjecting it to be taken for his debts, unless it be suffered to remain with him more than five years.

I have thus given my opinion on these questions, taking them in the point of view in which they were passed upon by the Court below, and discussed at the Bar here. But, there is an aspect of the case which seems to me conclusive, and renders all the points made, and the Opinions given in the Court below, immaterial and irrelevant. The Deed of Trust from Trigg to James C. Anthony, seems agreed on all hands to have been fairly executed, to secure a just debt. In Shep. Touch. 67; Eatwick v. Caillaud, 5 Term Rep. 425, and other cases, it is said, "that the question whether a Deed be legal or not, depends on the intention of the parties, at the time when it was executed: and that when a conveyance is not fraudulent at the time of making it, it shall never be said to be fraudulent for any matter ex post facto." Now, the sale was either fair, and must stand good, or it was fraudulent and void; if good, the Sheriff of course was a trespasser, in taking the property.

But how, if it was void? Why then 298 it seems to *me, that being a mere nullity, it leaves the Deed of Trust in full force and vigor. I do not mean to say, that as to Trigg, the sale is a nullity; for, though fraudulent, it would be binding on him; he could not be heard to impeach it. But, putting the sale out of the way of creditors, would not the Deed of Trust still operate to shield the property from their Executions? That property is fast bound for the debt of James C. Anthony. If, after a fair application of it to that debt, any surplus should remain, this would be a fund to which the creditors of Trigg ought to have resort, and could have resort: but it cannot be reached by Execution, for it is an equitable and contingent interest.

I think, therefore, that whether the sale were good or bad, the slave was not liable to Execution, and the Sheriff was a trespasser; that, in this point of view, the Opinions of the Court furnish no ground for reversing the Judgment, and that it must be affirmed.

JUDGE GREEN.

The Appellee brought this action against the Appellant, a Sheriff, who levied an Execution against Trigg on, and sold, a slave, which the Plaintiff alleges belongs to him. The Plaintiff claimed the slave, as a purchaser of that and other slaves from a Trustee to whom Trigg, the brother-in-law of the Appellee, had conveyed them, for securing a debt to James C. Anthony, a brother of the Appellee. The slave conveyed, had remained until the day of sale in the possession of Trigg, who lived on a tract of land rented by the Appellee. At the sale on the 21st May, 1812, the Appellee purchased all the slaves embraced in the Deed of Trust, at a sum a little short of the amount of the debt for which they were pledged, but paid no money; James C. Anthony having given an order, directing the money to be paid to the Appellee. After the sale, the slaves returned to the possession of Trigg, who kept them in his possession until the 299 end of the year 1812, when they *were put under an overseer, employed by the Appellee to manage the plantation on which Trigg resided, and still continued to reside, when the Sheriff levied the Execution on the slave in question, it being the same plantation before rented by the Appellee, and which he had rented for the year 1813. The negro was taken by the Sheriff from the possession of the overseer early in 1813, but it does not appear when the Execution was issued, or delivered to the Sheriff, or levied. The Appellee had procured, before the sale by the Trustee, the bond of another person, for the avowed purpose of raising money to pay Trigg's debt to James C. Anthony; and he and Trigg gave a Deed of Trust upon the slaves of Trigg embraced in the former Deed of Trust, and upon some of the Appellee's property, to indemnify the person who had given his bond to the Appellee. Money was raised upon this bond, to what amount does not appear, and money was remitted by the Appellee to James C. Anthony, but to what amount does not appear, he being also indebted to James C. Anthony. All this was done before the sale by the Trustee. The Appellee paid the amount of the bond which he had borrowed, to the holder. On the day of sale under the Deed of Trust, one only of two joint Trustees named in the Deed being present, Trigg gave his consent in writing, that the single Trustee should make the sale, in the absence of the other. Evidence was given of this fact, and that Trigg was much in debt. The Defendant offered to prove by a witness, that he attended the sale under the Deed of Trust, in tending to purchase some of the negroes, but was prevented from bidding by Trigg's telling him, that the Plaintiff was purchasing them for him. This evidence was rejected by the Court as inadmissible, to which the Defendant excepted.

Whenever the question, whether any evidence offered is, or is not admissible, depends on other facts already proved, the Court, whose province it is to decide the question as to its admissibility, must of necessity judge and determine 300 *the effect of the evidence ordered to prove the fact upon which that question depends.

In this case, I think it clear that the Appellee and Trigg acted in concert for the purpose of erecting a common object. Whether the fair and honest object of disposing of the trust property, for the purpose of satisfying his debt to James C. Anthony, and consequently, to deprive Trigg of all interest in the property disposed of for that purpose; or, under colour of a sale, to defeat the just claim of Trigg's creditors, to have satisfaction of their debts out of the surplus of the trust property, after a fair disposition of so much of it as might be necessary to satisfy the debt for which it was pledged, by procuring a feigned sale of the whole for the amount of the debt, and securing the whole of it to the use of Trigg, subject only as before, to the payment of the original debt, or so much of it as was really due, thus really preserving, whilst apparently extinguishing, Trigg's interest in the property. These were questions for the Jury, to be determined upon the weight they might give to the facts, if they were proved to their satisfaction, namely, the pecuniary embarrassments of Trigg, the connection of the parties concerned, the promotion of the sale by the voluntary act of Trigg, which resulted apparently in the total loss of all his interest in the property, whilst he still continued to enjoy it, and that no money was paid on the sale; and upon the fact, if the evidence offered to prove it was admissible, and credited, that he interposed to prevent the property from selling for a better price. In order to determine whether this evidence was or was not admissible, it devolved on the Court to determine, for itself, not for the Jury, whether the other facts were sufficiently proved, and whether these facts were prima facie sufficient proof, that the parties had combined to effect the fraudulent design of defeating the rights of Trigg's creditors in the manner above stated. And if so, then the proof of Trigg's interposition to prevent a real sale to a stranger to these are evidence against the others; yet, before such evidence can be admitted, the Court must decide for itself, that there is sufficient evidence prima facie, to prove such a combination, which the Jury may nevertheless negative. 2 Stark. on Evid. 44, 47; Rex v. Inhabitants of Hardwick, 11 East. 584; Rex v. Stone, 6 Term Rep. 527; Phillips' Law of Ev. 71-2-3.

301 contrivances, was admissible *evidence against the Appellee, not because it was necessary, in order to satisfy the Court as to the fraudulent design of the transaction, of which the Jury was finally to judge, but as fit evidence to be considered by the Jury, in forming their judgment upon the whole case. Nor is this an improper interference, on the part of the Court, with the province of the Jury, but the necessary effect of the constitution of our Judicial Tribunals, consisting of Courts and Juries. It is well settled, that in the case of several combining for an illegal purpose, the acts and declarations of each in respect to the common object,

If it were otherwise relevant to the issue, this evidence ought, I think, to have been admitted, not to prove that in truth the purchase was made for Trigg, but as proof of his act, tending to prevent a competition in the sale, from which the fraudulent intent aforesaid might be inferred.

The enquiry as to the propriety of the instruction given by the Court, presents the question, as to the doctrine of fraud per se, a few years since thought to be conclusively settled by an uniform course of decisions in England, and in the Supreme Court of the U. S., and now thought (as seems to me without good reason,) to be entirely unsettled and doubtful. This doctrine is deeply founded in the early principles of the Common Law, and declared and enforced by many ancient Statutes. It proceeds on the ground, that a possession and use of the property professedly transferred to another, inconsistent with the professed object of the transaction, is conclusive proof of a secret trust for the original owner, and therefore fraudulent as to his creditors, and liable to their Executions.

302 *As early as the 1st of Rich. 3, provisions were made by a Statute intended to protect purchasers against secret Uses, now called Trusts. This was effected by declaring that the conveyance of the cestui qui trust, whether the use were secret or open, should pass the legal title as against the Feoffee to the use, and all claiming under him, subsequent to the disposition of the property by the cestui qui use.

The Statute of 3 Hen. 7. ch. 4, enacts, that "all Deeds of Gift of goods and chattels, made in trust to the use of the grantor, to defraud creditors, shall be void." 13 Vin. Abr. 517, pl. 1. The Statute of 50 Edward 3, ch. 6, provided, that "fraudulent assurances of lands, or goods, to deceive creditors, shall be void, and they may have Execution thereof, as if no such gift had been made." This Statute was the first in order, and applied only to debtors who fled to Sanctuaries. That of Rich. 3, applied only to land, and chattels real, conveyed to the use of the grantor, and that of Hen. 7, only to the case of goods and chattels conveyed by the grantor, in trust for himself. These Statutes applying only to particular cases, the 13th of Elizabeth was enacted, in terms which embraced all conveyances, suits, bonds, judgments, and executions, intended to defraud creditors, and avoided them as to the creditors thereby defrauded, and this Statute we have introduced into our Code. These Statutes against Fraud have always been held to be declaratory of the Common Law, with this difference, that at Common Law, no one could complain of any fraud, unless he had an existing right when the fraud was committed, which was prejudiced by it; whereas, the Statutes enabled any subsequent creditor to impeach the fraudulent transaction, if there were any other creditor at the time, who might be defrauded by it. 3 Co. Rep. 82-3, Twyne's Case.

It is observable, that two of these Statutes were pointed particularly to the cases of frauds practised by means of secret trusts; the most ready expedient, and most commonly resorted to, for perpetrating

303 ing frauds, indeed almost "the only one. The real object of those transactions being, in general to preserve the property, for the benefit of the debtor, against the claims of his creditors, by representing it as belonging to another, whilst he enjoys the use of it: accordingly, the Courts must have considered the continued possession, and use of the property, by the debtor, notwithstanding an absolute transfer in form to another, as a proof of a secret trust, and therefore fraudulent and void, as to creditors, under the Statutes of Rich. 3, and Hen. 7, as a fortiori, under that of 13 Eliz., and also by the Common Law. So confirmed was this doctrine in the time of Elizabeth, that in Twyne's Case, it was treated as a settled doctrine, that wherever there was any trust for the donor, there was fraud against creditors, and that possession by the donor was considered as conclusive evidence of fraud. A gift to a child, was considered as fraudulent and void, not because it was voluntary, and without valuable consideration, but because a trust was inferred, that the "child, in consideration of the gift being voluntarily and freely given to him, and also in consideration of nature, would relieve his father, and not see him want, who had made such a gift to him." Indeed the drift of the argument in that case, is not to show that a secret trust avoids the transfer of the property, as being conclusive evidence of fraud, but taking that for granted, to show that if there is any trust whatever, express or implied, (the distinction between which is carefully explained,) the conveyance does not come within the proviso of the Statute, which excepts from its operation bona fide conveyances only. One of the reasons for the Judgment in that case, was, "Here was a trust between the parties, for the donor possessed all, and used them as his own proper goods;" and "every gift made on a trust, is out of this proviso, for that which between donor and donee is called a trust, per nomen speciosum, is in truth, as to all the creditors, a fraud," and "the continuance of the possession in the donor, is a sign of trust."

304 *From the manner in which the subject is treated in this case, and the terms of the Statute of Hen. 7, I should think that the decision was founded upon a long and well-settled doctrine, that a continued possession, inconsistent with the professed purpose of the transaction, was a fraud per se, that is, conclusive evidence of a trust, and therefore, a fraud. However this may be, this doctrine, which is called the rule of Edwards v. Harben, comparatively a very modern case, has never been questioned in England, or here, until very recently. This was the doctrine held in Stone v. Grubham, 2 Bulst. 226; in 12 Jas. 1; and Hungerford v. Earle, 2 Vern. 262, in 1692, and in Bucknall v. Roiston, Ch. Prec. 287, in 1709. In the latter case, Sir Edward Northey said, that it had been ruled so forty times, in his experience at Guildhall. This was also the doctrine in the Supreme Court of the U. S., in Hamilton v. Russell, 1 Cranch. 310, and has been repeatedly affirmed in this Court, without exception or reserve. Fitzhugh v. Anderson, 2 H. & M. 303; Alexander v. Deneale, 2 Munf. 341; Robertson v. Ewell, 3 Munt. 1; Thomas v. Soper, 5 Munf. 28; Williamson v. Farley, Gilm. 15. The decisions elsewhere, which are supposed to be modifications of, or exceptions to, this rule, are not so. In all those cases, the possession was not inconsistent with the professed purposes of the transaction, as if the sale be conditional, or the situation of the parties or property be such, as that it cannot be conveniently delivered to the purchaser, so it be delivered as soon as it conveniently can; or, it is avowedly pledged as a security for the payment of debts, by being conveyed to Trustees for that purpose; in all of these, and such like cases, the possession is not inconsistent, and the character of fraud is not necessarily stamped upon it. This rule is so fortified by the most venerable authority, and so well-founded in justice, and sound policy, that I should be very reluctant to depart from it lightly, or to fritter it away by refined distinctions.

305 *The only circumstances which can be alleged as taking this case out of the rule, are, that the legal title to the slaves was in the Trustee, who transferred it to the Appellee; that a large sum of money, secured by the Deed of Trust, was really due, either to James C. Anthony, or to the Appellee, if he had paid it to James C. Anthony, and that the Appellee had taken possession of the property before the Execution was levied. The circumstances, that there was a real debt due from Trigg, is of no consequence in itself; for, if a true creditor uses his debt in any way to cover the property of his debtor, and protect it from his other creditors, and with that intent, his title is void for fraud, so far as other creditors are impeded by it; as if a creditor, who has an Execution levied on the property of his debtor, directs the Sheriff not to sell it, but to leave it in the debtor's possession, a trust is implied as a matter of law, his Execution is fraudulent, and any other creditor may take the property in execution. 13 Vin. Abr. 524, pl. 3. In Twyne's Case, there was a real debt due to the purchaser of the debtor's property, and the Court said that it was not within the proviso of the 13th Elizabeth, which excepts conveyances made bona fide, and upon good consideration, "for, although it is on a true and good consideration, yet it is not bona fide, for no gift shall be deemed bona fide within the said proviso, which is accompanied with any trust: as if a man be indebted to five several persons, in the several sums of 20l., and hath goods of the value of 20l., and makes a gift of all his goods to one of them in satisfaction of his debt, but there is a trust between them, that the donee shall deal favorably with him, in regard of his poor estate, either to permit the donor, or some other for him, or for his benefit, to use, or have possession of them, and is contended that he shall pay him his debt when he is able; this shall not be called bona fide within the said proviso."

Nor does the fact, that the Appellee had taken possession of the property, before the Execution was levied, prevent 306 *the operation or application of the rule. That being founded upon the legal inference, from the continued possession, that there was a secret trust between the parties for the benefit of the debtor, it attaches upon all cases in which the possession has continued beyond the time, when the property might conveniently have been delivered to the purchaser, and the possession of the purchaser after the presumption of Law is fixed upon the transaction, cannot impair the force of that presumption. Accordingly in Edwards v. Harben, the rule was applied to the purchaser, as Executor de son tort, taking possession after the death of the debtor, who had continued in the possession only a few days after the sale. If the possession of the debtor be such, as that, during that possession, a creditor might have taken the property in Execution upon the ground that such possession made the conveyance fraudulent per se, and void in its inception, the change of possession could not make that good which was already void, and a creditor may take in Execution property fraudulently conveyed, and in possession of the fraudulent donee.

The remaining question, as to the effect of the Deed of Trust, which was valid in its inception, is important, and in respect to which, so far as I am informed, we have no satisfactory precedents. I do not mean the question, whether a sale under a Deed of Trust is, as a sale under an Execution, exempted from the operation of the rule of Edwards v. Harben; but the question, whether applying that rule, and finding that the sale under the Deed of Trust was fraudulent, it should be held that the property is liable to creditors, as if the Deed had never been made: or, vacating the sale only the creditor should be restored only to his original right to have satisfaction out of the surplus of the property left, after satisfying the debt for which it was pledged.

In the case of Hungerford v. Earle. 2 Vern. 261. (in 1692,) Commissioner Hatchins held, that a Deed not at first fraudulent may afterwards become so, 307 by being concealed, *or not pursued, by which means creditors are drawn in to lend their money. No Decree was, however, pronounced, but an issue was directed to try the question of fraud, the event of which is nowhere reported. This dictum is approved by Chancellor Kent (whose opinions are entitled to great respect,) in Hildreth v. Sands, 2 John. Ch. Rep. 35. On the other hand, it was held in Stone v. Grubham, in 1615, before cited, and in 1 Dews v. Brandt, Select Ch. Cases, 7, in the 11th year of George the first, by Raymond and Gilbert, Commissioners, that a Deed not fraudulent in its inception, could not become so by matter subsequent. And in this opinion I agree. The very terms of the Statute require that the conveyance, or security, shall, to render it void, be had or made with intent to defraud creditors or purchasers. Although a Deed valid in its inception is not rendered void at Law under the Statute, by using it for a fraudulent purpose, yet a Court of Equity, acting upon its general principles, would put it out of the way of a creditor, or purchaser, so far, if that were entirely, as might be necessary to put the party affected by it in the same situation in which he would have been but for the fraud.

I should consider the continued possession of Trigg in this case, as per se, making the sale under the Deed of Trust fraudulent and void, so far as it affected his interest in the trust property which was intended to be withdrawn, under colour of that sale, from the just claims of his creditors; a sale under a Deed of Trust, when no money is paid, being different in principle from a sale under Execution where the money is paid; the public officer performing his duty according to Law, and the trustee acting as the agent of both debtor and creditor, according to their directions, if they concur in them, as in this case they did. Other views, however, render it unnecessary to pursue this branch of the subject.

The Deed of Trust being valid, although used for a fraudulent purpose, and the sale under the Deed of Trust being 308 *fraudulent, and therefore void as to creditors, but good as between the parties, the case in effect is that of a mortgage of personal property in possession, the mortgagor having an interest in it, to the extent of the surplus which may remain after payment of the debt, liable to his creditors in some form. And the question is, whether such interest is the subject of an Execution upon a Judgment at Law.

The 30th section of our Statute of Conveyances, provides, that estates of every kind holden or possessed in trust, shall be subject to the debts and charges of the cestui qui trust in like manner, as if he owned the interest in the things so holden or possessed, as he owns in the uses or trusts thereof. This provision embraces those of the Statute of Richards, before referred to, and of the 10th section of the Statute of Frauds of the 29th Charles 2, combined, in respect to lands and chattels real, to which only they extend. A conveyance of personal property, or chattels real, by the legal owner, in which there is any trust for the owner, is void as to creditors, under the Statutes of Hen. 7, and 13th Eliz., and by the Common Law; but, personal property conveyed by a third person in trust for a debtor) or by a debtor in trust for the payment of debts, is not in England liable to an Execution on a Judgment against the cestui qui trust, either by force of any of those Statutes, or by the Common Law as has been there decided.

provides for this case. The terms, "estates of every kind, holden or possessed in trust," "the things holden or possessed," which are not found in the Statute of Rich. 3, and Chas. 2, were I think, intended to embrace all possible descriptions of property, real and personal: and this construction is strongly fortified by the fact, that the Statute concerning joint rights and obligations, prepared by the same Revisors who prepared this Act, has the same expression, ("the estates or things holden, or possessed,") applied clearly by the context to personal property. But, still 309 it can apply to no case where the cestui qui trust has not an immediate equitable right to the possession and enjoyment of the property; for, if it were a remainder, or contingent, as such a right, if legal, would not be subject to Execution until it fell into possession, so neither would such a trust. Trigg, having no immediate right, and none until the debt for which the property was pledged was satisfied, and the surplus ascertained, the Sheriff had no legal authority to take it from the possession of the Appellee, and was a trespasser. In this view, the evidence of Trigg's interposition to prevent competition, had no tendency to justify the levying of the Execution on the slave, and was therefore properly rejected, it being irrelevant to the matter in issue. And for the same reason, and not for those assigned by the Court, the instructions excepted to, declaring that in a certain state of facts, the sale would not be fraudulent per se, afford no ground for reversing the Judgment, since each of them was qualified by the expression "so as to subject the said slave to the creditors of the said Trigg," which was true. The creditor, whose Execution was levied on this slave, mistook his remedy. That was in a Court of Chancery, to have the debt due on the Deed of Trust ascertained, the property sold, the debt paid, and the balance, if any, applied towards the satisfaction of his Execution.

The Judgment should be affirmed.

JUDGE COALTER.

There are two Bills of Exceptions: one as to the rejection of evidence offered by the Appellant; the other in regard to an instruction as to the Law, given by the Court to the Jury. They both have reference to the same statement of facts, and I will consider the last first.

The Bill of Exceptions give a summary of what was proved before the Jury, from which it appears that one Trigg, being indebted to James C. Anthony, in the 310 sum of $2,680 29, executed a Deed of Trust on sundry slaves; that Mark Anthony, the Appellee, and who was brother-in-law of Trigg, was also indebted to James C. Anthony; that wishing to assist Trigg, he procured James Austin and John Anthony, to execute two bonds; one for 450l., payable the 19th January, 1812, and the other for 450l., payable the 19th January, 1813. The object, it seems, was to sell those bonds, and pay off the Deed of Trust. Trigg and Mark Anthony executed a Deed of Trust, to save harmless Austin and John Anthony, as to the bonds so given by them. In this Deed was comprised the slaves in the Deed of Trust to James C. Anthony, and also some slaves and lands belonging to Mark Anthony. A considerable sum, it appears, was raised on the bonds, but what amount was not proved; and about the time, Mark Anthony made considerable payments, but to what amount does not appear, to James C. Anthony, in his own name. No credit appears to have been entered on the Deed of Trust. These bonds were executed on the 26th August, 1811: when the money was raised on them, does not appear.

On the 23d May, 1812, William Mitchell, one of the Trustees in James C. Anthony's Deed, with the assent of Trigg, advertised and sold the slaves in that Deed, and Mark Anthony became the purchaser, received possession, and a Bill of Sale from the Trustee. The slaves were thereupon returned to the plantation of the Appellee, whereon Trigg lived, being a plantation which the Appellee had rented for the years 1811, 1812, and 1813; and it is stated, that it did not appear that Trigg interfered at all with the negroes. It was also proved, that in the year 1813, the Appellee employed an overseer for the said plantation, and placed under him the slaves purchased by him as aforesaid, and that none of them were subject to the control of Trigg, but were entirely under the control of the Appellee and his overseer, from whose possession one of them was taken under Execution as the property of 311 *Trigg; and for which alleged trespass this action is brought. The Execution bears date on the 28th January, 1813; but when it came to the possession of the Sheriff, or was levied, does not appear.

There is no proof whatever, nor any ground whereon to raise a suspicion, that this plantation was rented for Trigg, and that he was the real owner of the lease. On the contrary, it seems that he had not at any time any control over it, or the slaves on it, and that he certainly had none during the year 1813. There seems to have been no question raised, but that the overseer, from whose possession the slave was taken, was there during the whole of the year 1813; and of course, that he was so in possession when the Execution issued. It was clearly so understood by the Judge, and no dispute at all raised on that point. Whatever might have been the case, then, in 1812, the purchaser clearly had possession during the whole of the year 1813, and of course before the Execution issued. I think the Judge was right in his instruction given as to the Law on this state of the facts. But, this was a public sale, under the deed of Trust, by one having the legal title; and who, Trigg having assented to dispense with the presence of the other Trustee, was authorized by that assent, and the terms of the Deed, to make the sale. He did so, delivered possession, and conveyed the legal title from him, so far as he could convey it. As at present advised, I am unable to distinguish such a case as this from a sale under execution, or for rent; and if the purchaser in such latter case might permit the former proprietor to remian in possession, without being subject to the doctrine of fraud per se, I cannot see why he might not in this case.

It is true, a sale under a Deed of Trust, or even under an Execution, may be a mere cover to a fraudulent and secret trust for the benefit of the alleged debtor; but, such open and public transactions as these, are not, it seems to me, within the operation of the rule aforesaid. I therefore think, at present, that the Judge was right in 312 the *other branch of his instruction; and that such possession as was proved to be in Trigg in 1812, was only a circumstance which might avail with others to prove actual fraud in the transaction; and was, therefore, properly left to the Jury for that purpose, and that only. This alleged actual fraud the Jury negative by their verdict.

But, the other Bill of Exceptions shews, that evidence going to prove actual fraud, and combination to defeat creditors, was rejected, and the question is, was the testimony offered, properly rejected or not?

In considering this point, it seems to me that James C. Anthony must be taken to be a bona fide creditor of Trigg to the amount of $2,650 29, for the payment of which the sale was made.

The Plaintiff was his agent, and receiver of this money on the day of sale, and became the purchaser of the property. It would seem that Trigg was his debtor also, on account of the transactions in relation to the bonds which were sold as aforesaid, and which the Appellee has since paid off in the hands of the holders.

The property incumbered by Trigg to James C. Anthony, and which was sold as aforesaid, was the only property which stood between the Appellee and harm, and he may be considered a second incumbrance on it, for his indemnity. He received the amount the bonds sold for, but he was to take in those bonds or his estate would suffer. The incumbered property of Trigg was to be applied first to take them in. If it proved insufficient, he would lose the difference between what the bonds were sold for, and what he had to pay for them. It was natural, and proper, then, for him to get himself into such a situation, that he could bid at the sale without having to advance the money, to the full extent of the first incumbrance, so as to purchase in, and make his second incumbrance cover whatever the slaves might be worth, to have what they would sell for in cash. He could have bid up under the second 313 incumbrance too, so as to save *his own property so far harmless in regard to the bonds, and the Deed of Trust aforesaid.

Had he been in no wise connected with Trigg, this course would have tended to produce the best possible sale. It was the natural and proper course, according to the evidence, had he been a stranger. But, he was the brother-in-law of Trigg, in addition to which he had permitted Trigg to live on his plantation, and Trigg had agreed that one Trustee might proceed to sell. If, in addition to this, it had appeared hat the negroes were worth more in cash than both the incumbrances, and that if he could get them in, without paying more for them, he might aid Trigg in future, there would be some ground to suspect that in fact it had been agreed, that if he could so get them in, he would hold them for his benefit, to the extent that their real value exceeded both debts.

Had there been proof then, of the amount the bonds sold for, so as to show what was the extent of both debts, and that the real cash value of the slaves exceeded that amount to any considerable extent so as to make a project of this kind really available to him, the near connection, and friendship between the parties might have led to a suspicion of such combination. But, neither the extent of the debts, nor the real cash value of the slaves is proved. They seem to have been set up singly, except one family, and sold for considerable prices. And it does not appear but that they were sold for full prices: nothing appears to the contrary. They may have sold for more than they could have been sold for, had not the Appellee had it in his power to bid to the extent of the debts aforesaid. There is no unfairness of conduct imputed to the Trustee. He knew of no fraud or combination, but sold for as much as he could get.

If, however, there was in reality nothing due on those Deeds of Trust; if they have been merely used as a cover, to enable the Appellee to purchase in this property, and cover it for Trigg, creditors might 314 have enquired into it *on a bill for that purpose, or perhaps might have proved it in this suit; but, there being no proof of fraud or combination, we ought not to suspect it, merely on the ground of the connexion subsisting between the parties. Acts of benevolence from one connexion towards another ought not to be repressed, for fear of imputations of this kind, unless they can be supported by pregnant circumstances.

Under this state of the evidence, William Leftwich is introduced to prove, "that he attended the sale under the Deed of Trust, with intent to purchase one of the slaves; that he was taken out by Trigg, who requested him not to bid for the slaves, stating that the Appellee was to buy the property for him, the said Trigg." This evidence was rejected, unless it could be shown, that the Appellee was privy to Trigg's statement, or in other manner consented to it.

The witness deos not even state, that he forbore to bid, if that would have made any difference, or that this was generally understood, and the biddings repressed; or that the Trustee knew or suspected it, or that the slave he intended to bid for, or any other slave, was sold for less than he would have been willing to give.

This evidence was offered as the declaration of one of two confederates in an unlawful act; but, before such evidence can be given, there must be proof of the confederacy, of which proof the Court is to judge. The declarations of a third party not on oath, are not evidence, until by some legal evidence the combination is proved. That cannot be proved by declarations not on oath, in order to let in those very declarations as proof before the Jury. Neither Court nor Jury are to hear such declarations, until a foundation is laid for their introduction. Here, the only evidence of fraud or combination is the say so of Trigg. This I think was properly rejected.

The Judgment must be affirmed.

315 *JUDGE CABELL.

The Deed of Trust executed by William Trigg, for securing the debt due by him to James C. Anthony, left in Trigg an equitable and contingent interest in the property conveyed by the Deed of Trust: and such an interest is not liable to execution. The opinions given by the Judge during the progress of the cause, could not, therefore, even if they be erroneous, (as to which, however, I express no opinion,) furnish any ground for reversing the Judgment.

In the case of Land v. Jeffries, (See Appendix to 5th Rand. p. 599,) I had occasion to express, at large my opinions on what is commonly called "the rule of fraud per se;" as also on the exceptions to it. It cannot be necessary to repeat them here.

March 1828.

Evidence—Handwriting—Witnesses—Refreshing Memory.—The evidence of a witness as to hand-writing, who has formed an acquaintance with it from seeing the party write, or from a course of correspondence, is not rendered incompetent, nor its weight impaired, by his having referred to papers in his own possession, known to be written by the party, to refresh his (the witness's) memory. By the whole Court of four Judges.

Same—Same—Comparison of Hands.—Two Judges (CARR and COALTER) were of opinion, that the evidence of a witness, who has frequently seen the testator write his name to receipts, and who has resorted to those receipts, before he gives his evidence, to refresh his memory as to the hand-writing, but who testifies that he believes the body of the will and signature to be the hand-writing of the testator, though he forms that belief from comparison, and that he would not be able to prove the hand-writing, except from comparing it with the signature to the said receipts, was competent evidence to prove the hand-writing, and when supported by the evidence of another witness to the hand-writing, and by corroborating circumstances, is of sufficient weight to support a Testament of chattels. Two other Judges, (GREEN and CABELL,) were of opinion, that the evidence was not competent.

Same—Same.—Qn: In a Court of Probate, it is not competent for the Court to compare the hand-writing of the paper in question with that of papers produced in Court admitted to be genuine, or †Evidence—Handwriting—Comparison of Hands.—In Hanriot v. Sherwood, 82 Va. 18, it is said: "In the first case cited by counsel, decided in this state, Redford v. Peggy, 6 Rand. 816, the question whether evidence by comparison of hand be admissible, was not directly before the court; yet the nature of the case seemed to bring the point under review; and out of the four Judges who sat two say that such evidence is inadmissible, and it is claimed that the same conclusion may be drawn from the opinion of a third." In this case the last headnote reads: Under the rules of evidence in this state, expert testimony is admissible to test the genuineness of disputed writings by comparison of writings admitted or proved to be genuine with writings alleged to be forged. To the same point the principal case is cited in Rowt v. Kile, 1 Leigh 222; Sharp v. Sharp, 2 Leigh 254.

*For monographic note on Handwriting, see end of case.

In Pepper v. Barnett, 22 Gratt. 406, it is said: "Where the witness has seen the party write, and is able to swear to his belief, that the writing in question is the hand of that person, such evidence is clearly admissible as legal proof of hand-writing, and is considered as distinct from evidence by compari-proved to be so? Is not the rule before a Court of Probate different from that in trials before a Jury?

Wills—Proof of—Witnesses Necessary.—By the Ecclesiastical Law, which, as to proof of Wills in Courts of Probate, is still our Law, two witnesses are necessary to prove Wills of chattels. By the whole Court.

Olograph Will—Establishment of—Witnesses Necessary.—But by GREEN and CABELL, the rule is different as to olograph Wills, or such as are written wholly by the Testator. They thought, that by our Statute an olograph Will of lands may be established by the evidence of one uncontradicted and unimpeached witness; and, on the principle, that omne majus continet in se minus, such a Will of chattels might be so proved. The other two Judges did not express a concurrence in this opinion.

The Appellees, Peggy and other negroes, who had been slaves of George Redford deceased, appeared in forma pauperis, before the County Court of Powhatan, and applied to the Court to admit to probate a Testamentary Paper, purporting to be the last Will and Testament of the said Redford. The application was resisted by Benjamin T. Davis, Administrator of the estate, and the Court on the 10th October, 1825, decided that it was not the Will of Redford, and refused to admit it to Probate. From that Judgment, the paupers appealed to the Superior Court of Law for Powhatan, where the Judgment of the 317 County *Court was reversed, and the Will admitted to Record. From this last Judgment, the Administrator appealed to the Court of Appeals.

The following is a copy of the Testamentary Paper:

"Being of sound mind and memory do make this my last Will and Testament in manner and form following: My Will is that all my slaves may at my death be emancipated and sit free, to wit, Lewis, Peg, and all her chil-and dren and grand-children, Tener and all her children and grand-children them and their heirs forever; but Lewis, Essix, Tim, & Charles, Will, Daniel and Tarlton are to pay to some person appointed by the Overseers of the Poor for the support of Milly a lunatick ten dollars per year, and her mother Tener, and if they, or either of do not the sum o ten dollars each the said Overseers are to hire them to some person to rease the sum of said ten dollars each: If the Assembly will not permit them to stay within this State my desire is that my Ex'rs or either of them do employ some person to carry them to some free State, and pay it out of my estate: I do appoint son, Greenl. on Ev. §§ 876-877: Redford v. Peggy, 6 Rand. 816." See further, monographic note on "Evidence" appended to Lee v. Tapscott, 2 Wash. 276.

‡Will of Personality—Witnesses Necessary.—In Worsham v. Worsham, 6 Leigh 589, it was held that before the statute of 1834-5, ch. 60, a testament of personal estate might well be proved by a single witness. JUDGE CARR, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In Redford v. Peggy, three Judges did intimate their opinions, that two witnesses were necessary to a will of chattels; but we did not consider that as a solemn decision on the point, because each of those three Judges decided the case upon other points distinct from that."

The principal case is also cited on this subject in Moore v. Moore, 8 Gratt. 381.

See further, monographic note on "Wills" appended to Hughes v. Hughes, 2 Munf. 209.

It is well settled that emancipated slaves may propound for probate the deed or will conferring their right of freedom. Reld v. Blackstone, 14 Gratt. 366, citing the principal case to sustain the point.

Geo. Redford."

"I have not had this witnessed as I think my is well enough known and no person present.

Geo. Redford."

The evidence given at the trial before the Superior Court was spread on the Record, and is as follows:

Henry W. Watkins, senr., a witness for the paupers, says that he is well acquainted with the hand-writing of the Testator, and believes the paper now in controversy to be wholly in the hand-writing of the Testator, including the signature thereto: the witness saw the Testator frequently, and some short time before his death, perhaps a year or two, had business with him, and thinks he was as *capable in relation to soundness of mind of making a Will then as any man he had ever known who was any thing like as old; he was becoming feeble, and was getting very deaf, and frequently got other persons to do business for him: the witness thinks it very probable that the Testator would have been more easily influenced in his latter days by persons in whom he had confidence, than he would have been in early life: he thinks the cancelled Will, dated 4th August, 1811, and offered in evidence by the paupers, is in the hand-writing of the Testator, and more like that hand when he knew it well than the writing of the paper in controversy: being shown a Deed dated 16th November, 1803, and offered as evidence by the paupers, the witness said he believed it to be in the hand-writing of the Testator: and upon being shown the paper offered in evidence dated November 12th, 1820, said he did not believe it to be in the hand-writing of the Testator. The witness says, that he became familiar with the hand-writing of the Testator in 1792, and from thence for ten or fifteen years they did much business together, so that the hand-writing of the said Testator was nearly as familiar to him as his own; after that, the Testator becoming old, did much less business of that sort which required him to write more than his own name, with his manner of doing which the witness continued familiar to the time of Testator's death; but, in his general writing there was manifest deterioration from what it had been at an earlier time of the Testator's life, when in the course of business his general hand-writing was familiar to the witness as aforesaid; that the witness knew the signature to the Will as soon as he saw it; says he verily believes it to be in the hand-writing of the Testator; but, the hand-writing of the body of the Will is so changed from the time before spoken of, that had he seen it without the name and signature, he doubts whether he could have pointed out the author, and thinks he could not have done so without some circumstance, other than the writing itself, to point his attention to him; that had *he been named he would still have perhaps hesitated to say it was his hand-writing until his memory was refreshed, on the change produced by old age, by reference to other papers which from time to time the Testator had written, and are in possession of the witness: on thus refreshing his memory, the witness says, the writing though worse, retains in a good degree its original character, and on close inspection, he now verily believes that the Will is wholly written by the Testator: and he thinks he should have said so without reference to any other paper, but not with that certainty and promptness that he would have answered as to the signature: with respect to the second, or last signature to the Will or note, the christian name is unlike the Testator's writing, so that on seeing that without the other, he should have said the Testator did not write it: but, the surname (Redford,) appears to have been written by the Testator, whose manner of making the letter R, was very peculiar.

Claiborne Watkins, another witness for the paupers, says, that he has seen the Testator write his name frequently to receipts, and believes from comparison, that the paper now in controversy with the signature, is wholly in the hand-writing of the Testator; believes he should not have been able to prove the hand-writing of the Testator, except from comparison with the signature to the receipts aforesaid. The witness says, he was a near neighbour of the Testator, who was remarkably lenient, and indulgent to his slaves; never thought his mind was injured by age, or other cause; he was very deaf, but had a good recollection of the events of his early life.

There were also sundry witnesses examined in the Administrator.

George B. Davis heard the Testator say not long before his death, that he was not able to attend to business, and had gotten Joseph B. Davis frequently to attend to business for him: heard him frequently express his dislike to free negroes, and knows that he had sold one of his 320 women *because she had a free husband: has heard him complain of one of his nephews for allowing free negroes to remain on his land: thinks the Testator was unable to attend to his business, from old age and infirmity, and not from want of soundness of mind.

Joseph B. Davis was at the Testator's house on the day he died, in October or November, 1820, and examined, with some gentlemen, the Testator's papers. They found no Will, except one that had the name torn off. The Testator's papers were afterwards carried to the witness's house by one of the Testator's negroes. Some days afterwards, he was about again to examine the papers, and upon opening the chest which contained them, he found the paper now in controversy at the top of the papers in the chest. There was room to slip in the paper under the lid when the chest was locked. The witness acted as Agent for the Testator for several years before his death, and thinks that about 1818, it was hard for him to understand things. He was very deaf, and from the debility of his body and mind, he was scarcely able to have made and written a Will in the year 1818. He left a tract of land of three hundred acres, and other property not named in the paper in controversy. Several persons were engaged in the examination of the papers; and after the examination at the Testator's house, the papers were thrown promiscuously all in a chest together. The Testator was very tender to his slaves, and seemed to feel very much for them when distressed, but sold one of his negro women expressly because she had a free husband. The recollection of the Testator for some years before his death was so much better in relation to things which had happened some number of years previously, than in relation to things which had lately occurred. The Testator's wife is named in the cancelled Will, dated 4th August, 1811, and was dead before 1818. The negro Will, intended to be emancipated by the Deed dated 16th November, 1803, remained in slavery till the Testator's death. The negro woman 321 Fanny sold *by the Testator to Thomas T. Tuggle, was the daughter of Peggy, one of the negroes named in the paper in controversy. The paper offered in evidence by the paupers, dated 12th November, 1820, was brought to the witness by Tarlton, one of the negroes included in the Will in controversy, shortly after the Testator's death, who said he found it near the Testator's house.

Thomas T. Tuggle deposed, that he bought of the Testator in January, 1819, the woman whom he sold on account of her having a free husband. That free man had behaved badly. He insisted on visiting the witnesses's house against his will, and finally attempted to carry her off. The witness made the contract with the Testator in person, and paid him the money, and thinks he was in his proper mind.

Benjamin B. Hughes and John Maxcy, jr. deposed, that they assisted with several others to examine the papers of the testator, and did not find the paper now in controversy. The persons engaged in the examination, would take different bundles or parcels of papers, and after looking at them, would throw them into the chest, announcing that no Will was found.

Samuel Davis testified, that the Testator had a great dislike to free negroes for many years before his death; particularly to the husband of a woman whom he had sold for having a free husband.

William Forlines testified to the testator's dislike to free negroes, and has heard him express his opposition to the emancipation of negroes: Heard him say the year before he died, that he had made a Will in his wife's life-time by which he had given her six or seven negroes, but that since her death he had made another Will.

William Smith heard the testator say about 1817, he wished there was not a free negro in America, and heard him express the same sentiment, after he had sold the negro woman, for having a free husband.

Thomas Watkins says, that he knew the hand-writing of the testator some 322 *which time the Testator acted as a sort of Assistant Deputy Sheriff with the witness, and the witness had then frequent opportunities of seeing his writing in lists of Juries made out by him, and sometimes in other cases. He thinks there is not any great resemblance between his hand-writing then, and that of the paper in controversy; thinks he formerly wrote a much better hand. The Will, dated in August, 1811, offered in evidence in this cause, being shown to the witness, he said he could not be positive whether it was the Testator's hand-writing, or not. The Deed, dated in November, 1803, being also shown to him, he said he did not know, and could not say, whether or not it was in his hand-writing. He did not think he was acquainted with the Testator's signature.

Benjamin Bennet testified, that Mr. Redford frequently told him, that he never would set free his negroes, and expressed considerable hatred against free negroes. The witness once told Redford, that if he would let him have a little negro for a nurse, if he R., wished to set her free at a certain age, when she arrived at that age, he would discharge her and give her one hundred dollars. Mr. Redford considered himself insulted at this proposition, and said with much warmth, that he never would free one of his negroes. The last conversation they had on the subject was the summer before he died.

William S. Dance, a witness for the paupers, testified, that he heard the Testator examined as a witness in Powhatan Superior Court, in a pauper cause, in May, 1820, in which he gave evidence of occurrences in 1761. He was very deaf, but gave in a clear and distinct statement of facts. He exhibited no want of understanding, or debility of mind, but seemed clearly and readily to understand questions propounded to him, as soon as he could be made to hear them. The Deed offered in evidence, dated 16th November, 1803, has not been recorded.

The original writing or Deed tendered in evidence, is as follows: 323 *'Know all men by these presents that agreeable to an Act of the General Assembly of Virginia, I do hereby immanypate, and set free my negro boy Will, son of Tener, who was born 16 August 1791, and my desire is that the said Will be by the Court set free: and that Eliasa Maxcy, and Horatio Maxcy as to the carrying the same into effect: As witness my hand & seal this 16 November 1803.

Geo. Redford (Seal.)

"The above is done at the request of them that is no more."

The original writing or Will, herein-before mentioned, dated 4th August, 1811, is as follows:

"I George Redford being of sound mind and memory do make this my last Will and Testament in manner & form following: First, I lend to my beloved wife Jane the following slaves that is Lewis, Peg, and all her children, and grand children, Beck and their increase during her life, and at her death my will and desire is that they, and their increase be freed, and immanypated, and if the Law of this State will not suffer them to stay here, or the General Assembly will not permit them to stay here that my brother Richard Redford or his heirs do contrive to get them to the State of Kentucky, and county of Shelby; do git them carried there, for which trouble they are to serve him five years, and then to be free, & their increase.

'Item, my will further is, that the rest of the slaves, Tener, and all her children be freed, or immancipated with all their increase, and if cannot be permitted to stay as above that may stay in this Commonwealth, they may be sent to my brother Richard to stay with him five years, except Will to stay four years, and that each of them be furnished with five dollars to bear their expenses there, and to have my small cart, and horse called Chancellor, or one as good; and that my still be sold to raise the money, and bal's afterwards to be applied to carrying Lewis, Peg, and children, and to be made up five dollars for each of them out of my estate; then Lewis, Peg, & children to be free.

324 *'Item, I give the rest of estate not given above or freed except my land to my beloved wife Jane, to her & her heirs forever.

"Item, I lend my to my said wife my land & plantation whereon I now live, but the land is not to be rented out, on forfeiture of her claim, during her life: My desire is that that my estate may not be appraised and hereby appoint my said wife, Elisha Maxcy, & Josiah Forlines, Executrix and Exors. of this my last Will, and Testament, hoping they will use their best endeavours to fulfill my desire with trying the Assembly to git them suffered to stay in this Commonwealth as many of them have husbands and wives to leave behind, and they are as industrious & honest any other slaves:

"Witness my hand & seal this 4 day of August one thousand eight hundred & eleven.

"Powhatan, this 4 May, 1811."

And the original writing or Will, dated 12th November, 1820, herein-before mentioned, is as follows, to wit:

"And I give the mar to Betsy Forlines, if she have your foal give that to Jane; if should dy, I want Joseph Davis set them all at liberty: I have toiled if the behave themself that the never serve nobody after my death: I have been very much interested about what Thomas Tuggle said to me my negroes that tha shod suffer after my death, but set them all at liberty at my death: Joseph Davis & Lucy Davis I depend on to see my negroes sot free.

George Redford.

"November 12, 1820.

"Lucy Davis leave gig & gig mar to you, and all the cows your Joseph Davis & Ben: Davis, all but one, give that to Misis Jordan, she has been good to me indeed: all my negroes to sot free: Mary & Daniel must 5 dollars; vary sick when roat this, weak with all, I roat this is my negroes might not be imposed by no one. I hope Joseph Davis will see them righted.

325 I depend on Joseph Davis *to see them righted; her I say Mary & Daniel must have 5 dollars between them equally divided at my death.

what I have given her; all the cows she has got she must keep them to herself, but set them free at any rate: I depend on your see them righted allways Joseph Davis to—

George Redford.

"November 12th 1820."

Here ends the evidence.

The Superior Court certified that the evidence of Claiborne Watkins, going to prove the hand-writing of the said George Redford deceased, by comparing with other writings signed or written by him, and all the evidence of like character, was objected to by the Administrator of Redford, but its competency, as well as its effect, was reserved by the Court for the final decision.

The Attorney General for the Appellant. Nash, for the Appellee.

March 29. The Judges delivered their opinions.*

JUDGE CARR.

This is a case of Probate. George Redford died at a very advanced age, without wife or child, and possessed of a tract of land, and a number of slaves. A paper was produced to the County Court of Powhatan, purporting to be the Testament of Redford. There was no witness to it; but persons were produced to prove that the body of the writing, as well as the signature, were wholly written by Redford. It is a Testament of personals entirely, no notice being taken of the Testator's 326 land, and the whole intent *of the paper appearing to be, to give freedom to his slaves, and directions about the dispositions to be made with respect to them, if the Laws did not permit them to remain in the State. Executors were appointed; but, the contest here is, between the slaves seeking Probate, and the Administrator resisting it. The County Court decided, that the paper was not the last Will of Redford, and ought not to be recorded as such. On appeal, the Superior Court reversed this decision, and directed the paper to be recorded as the last Will and Testament of Redford; from which the appeal is taken to this Court.

In the argument of this cause, there were (among others) two very important questions raised, which I do not mean to consider: 1. Whether the Ecclesiastical Law, with respect to Testaments was the Law of this State: 2. Whether a Testament of personals, written (body and signature) by the Testator himself, can be established on proof by one witness of the hand-writing. I do not examine these points, because I can decide this case with perfect satisfaction to my own mind, without touching them.

The first witness to the hand-writing of the Testator, is Henry Watkins; and I consider his evidence full to the fact, and given under circumstances entitling it to great weight. He says that he is well acquainted with Redford's hand-writing: that he became familiar with it in 1792, and from thence, for ten or fifteen years, they did much business together; so that the hand-writing was nearly as familiar to him as his own; that after this, the Testator growing old, did much less business of that kind which required him to write more than his name; with his manner of doing which, the witness continued familiar to the time of his death: that he believes the whole Will to be in the hand-writing of Redford: that he knew the signature as soon as he saw it; but, of the body of the Will, he at first had doubts, the hand-writing in that part being much changed for the worst, since he was familiar with it. He states then, the course of reflection and examination, which, * (with the aid of refreshing his memory by inspection of some papers in his possession known to be written by Redford,) had banished all doubt, and enabled him to speak with confidence. The resort to these papers was not improper; and I repeat, that so far as one witness could go towards it, this hand-writing is proved.

Next is the evidence of Claiborne Watkins, who says, "he has seen the Testator write his name frequently to receipts, and believes, from comparison, that the paper now in controversy, with the signature, is wholly in the hand-writing of the Testator; believes he should not have been able to prove the hand-writing of the Testator, except from comparison of the signature with the receipts aforesaid."

It was objected, that this evidence was not admissible, being founded on comparison of hand-writing.

In the first place, I question whether the strict rule with respect to the admissibility of evidence before a Jury, applies to a Court, who, in a question of Probate, are to judge upon the whole matter, both of law and fact, and who, by their Constitution, are the tribunal in all cases to decide the Law.

But passing this by, I think that before a Jury, the evidence of this witness would be admissible; its weight, of course, to be greater or less, as to the Jury should seem right. When it is laid down as a rule, that evidence by comparison of hands is not admissible, we must recollect, that "by comparison, is now meant a comparison by the juxta-position of two writings, in order, by such comparison, to ascertain whether both were written by the same person." See Starkie's Evidence, vol. 2, p. 654, and the cases he cites. Formerly, if a witness, called to prove hand-writing, said he had seen the party write, and believed this to be his hand; this was considered as evidence by comparison of hands, and as inadmissible, at least in criminal cases; as appears from the Statute reversing the attainder of Algernon Sidney; and in the case of the seven Bishops. 4

328 State Trials, 338. But, such *evidence is clearly admissible now, as legal proof of hand-writing, and considered as distinct from evidence by comparison. This is laid down as settled Law, by Peake, Phillips, and Starkie, and the cases they refer to, to support them. There is also a strong case upon this subject, Eagleton v. Kingston, 8 Ves. 472. Nor do the cases stop here. In Lord Ferrers v. Shirley, Fitzg. 195. Lord Raymond, laid it down, that it was not necessary in all cases, that the witness should have seen the party write, to whose hand he swears; for, if there has been a fixed correspondence by letters, and it can be made out that the party writing such letters, is the same man that attested the Deed, it will enable the witness to swear to that person's hand-writing, although he never saw him write.

The general rule seems to be, that the best evidence of hand-writing is the witness who actually saw the party write it; but, as this can seldom be had, in its absence, any person may be called to prove the hand, who has, by sufficient means, acquired such a knowledge of the general character of it, as will enable him to swear to his belief, that the writing in question is the hand of that person; and this knowledge may be acquired from having seen him write, though but once, or from a correspondence with the party on matters of business, or from any other transactions between them; as, from having paid Bills of Exchange, according to his written direction, for which he afterwards accounted. See the cases referred to by 2 Starkie, 651-2-3. This doctrine has been often acted upon also in New York.

In Titford v. Knott, 2 Johns. Cas. 211, the Plaintiff called his confidential Clerk to prove the endorsement of the note by the Defendant. The witness testified, that the Plaintiff and the Defendant (who resided in London,) had long been correspondents, and that these letters came to his hands; and though he had never seen the Defendant write, he believed the endorsement to be his hand from the knowledge he had acquired from the correspondence.

329 *The opinion of the Court was delivered by Kent, J., who said, that the evidence was undoubtedly admissible and competent; that it was usual for witnesses to prove hand-writing from previous knowledge of the hand, derived from having seen the person write, and from authentic papers received in the course of business. He added, "if the witness has no previous knowledge of the hand, he cannot then be permitted to decide it, in Court, from a comparison of hands." The same question was settled in the same way, in Jackson v. Van Dusen, 5 Johns. Rep. 144; Johnson v. Davenport, 19 Johns. Rep. 134; see also, Peake's N. P. Cas. 21; 1 Esp. Cas. 15, 351-2.

Now, what is the evidence of C. Watkins? That he has frequently seen Redford sign his name to receipts, and believed from comparison, that the body and signature of the Will was wholly written by him. If he had stopped here, there could have been no question about this evidence; for, the comparison spoken of, would have been taken as nothing more than that comparison which every witness must make in his mind, when he testifies in a case of this kind. But he adds, that he believes he should not have been able to prove the hand, except from comparison with the signature to the receipts aforesaid. Now, it must be observed, that this comparison was not made by placing the different papers together, and thus forming an opinion; nor was it made in Court, by a witness having no previous knowledge of the hand, and then for the first time deciding from comparison. But, this was a witness who had often seen the party sign his name to receipts, and who having, as it would seem, those receipts in his possession or power, resorted to them, (I presume after he heard that he was to be examined as to the Will;) and having refreshed his memory by inspecting them, says, on his examination, that he believes the Will is in the hand-writing of Redford. From the cases cited, I believe that this would have been good evidence, if he had never seen the party write. Suppose he had had dealings with Redford, and had paid him 330 *money, upon which Redford had (though not in his presence,) executed these receipts, and given them to him, he had looked at them, after receiving them, and then put them safely away. Afterwards, on being told that he would be called on to testify as to Redford's hand-writing, he had turned to these receipts, examined them carefully, put them away, and in Court had said, he believed the Will was written by Redford, and stated these facts as the grounds of his belief. The case would have stood upon the same ground with those, where a knowledge was derived from letters in a course of correspondence, or paying bills by his written directions, &c.

But, the case is stronger here; for, Watkins had often seen Redford write; and though he says he believes he could not have proved the hand-writing, without a recurrence to the receipts, he does not say that his present opinion is derived wholly from that source. He might have a recollection of the party's writing, from having seen him write, but so faint and indistinct, that he could not, from it alone, have proved the Will; and yet, this recollection might form a material ingredient in his present belief. I am decidedly of opinion, that he was an admissible witness.

In addition to this, there are strong and pregnant circumstances, concurring to support the witnesses. In a Deed, dated the 16th of November, 1803, Redford set free a negro boy named Will. In 1811, he made a Will, by which he gave some of his slaves to his wife for her life, and to be free at her death; the best of them to be free on his death. These papers, (proved to be genuine,) taken in connection with the Will of 1818, show a fixed determination, during all that time, to free his slaves. When his wife was living, he gave her some of them for her life; but she being dead, and he having no child, the slaves seem to have been the first objects of his bounty. There are in these papers some other striking peculiarities, strongly indicating that they are the work of the same

331 *hand. One is, his manner of spelling the word emancipate. It is used four times, once in the Deed, twice in the second Will, and once in the last; and each time, it is spelt im-mancy-pate. I have never seen it so spelled before; and I think it a strong circumstance. In addition to this, Redford told Forlines, the year before he died, (which was after the date of this last Will,) that he had made a Will in his wife's life-time, in which he had given her six or seven negroes; but that since her death, he had made another Will. Nobody speaks of any other than this, except that in 1820; which, though certainly not proved, and too imperfect for any thing, I have a strong impression was written by Redford; and if so, still further shows, how strongly possessed he was of the idea of freeing his slaves. The circumstances on the other side deserves no weight in my mind; and I am clearly for affirming the Judgment.

JUDGE GREEN.

The paper offered for Probate, as the Will of George Redford, is alleged to be wholly written and signed by him. There is no subscribing witness to it, nor any proof that it was acknowledged by him as his Will, to any person whatever; or that any person ever saw it, until after George Redford's death. The proofs given to establish the fact, that the Will was wholly in the hand-writing of G. Redford, are the testimony of Henry Watkins and Claiborne Watkins; the first of whom testifies, that he is well acquainted with his hand-writing, and believes that the paper in question was wholly in his hand-writing, including the signature thereto: that he was familiar with his hand-writing from 1792, and for ten or fifteen years did much business with him, and was as familiar with his hand-writing as with his own; and after that, becoming old, he did much less business of the sort which required to write more than his name; with his manner of 332 doing which, he *continued familiar until the time of his death: that in Redford's general hand-writing, there was a manifest deterioration since he had been in the habit of doing business with him, as aforesaid; but, that he knew the signature to the Will to be his, as soon as he saw it: that the hand-writing of the body of the Will is so changed, since the witness did much business with him, as aforesaid, that had he seen it without the name and signature, he doubts whether he could have pointed out the Author, and thinks he could not have done so, without some circumstance, other than the writing itself, to point his attention to him: that, if he had been named, he would still perhaps have hesitated to say it was his hand-writing, until his memory was refreshed on the change produced by old age, by reference to other papers, which from time to time the Testator had written, and were in the possession of the witness; and in thus refreshing his memory, the witness says, that the writing, though worse, retains in a good degree its original character; and on close inspection, he now verily believes that the Will is wholly written by the Testator, and he thinks he should have said so without reference to any other paper, but not with that certainty and promptness, that he would have answered as to the signature; that, with respect to the signature to a memorandum at the foot of the Will, the christian name is unlike the Testator's writing; so that, seems that without the other, he should have said that he did not write it; but, the surname appears to be written by him, his manner of making the R. being very peculiar.

The other witness testifies, that he has frequently seen the Testator write his name to receipts, and believes from comparison, that the paper in question, with the signature, is wholly in his hand-writing; but, believes he should not have been able to prove the hand-writing of the Testator, except from comparison with the signature to the receipts aforesaid.

333 *Upon this evidence, the Appellant insists, that the paper in question is not proved to be in the hand-writing of Redford; or if it is so proved, it is only proved by one witness, and that the proof of one witness is not sufficient to establish a Testament of personals.

The proof by the first witness is certainly full to the point. It is sufficient for the proof of hand-writing, that the witness states that he is acquainted with it, showing that he had due means of forming such an acquaintance, and that he believes from that acquaintance, that it is the hand-writing of the person; and this is the substance of the testimony of the witness. He concludes, that upon close inspection, he verily believes it to be the hand-writing, and thinks he should have said so, without reference to any other paper. That he had actually referred to other papers to refresh his memory, does not impair the validity of his testimony, and but slightly affects its weight. It can hardly be expected, that any cautious and conscientious man would speak promptly and confidently upon such a subject, which is at last only a matter of belief and opinion, without a close inspection of the writing, and refreshing his memory by all means in his power. It is like an acquaintance with the human countenance. We frequently know the face upon first sight, without knowing when or where we have before seen it; and having forgotten to whom it belongs, we are reminded, by circumstances brought to our recollection by some extraneous information, of the name of the person, and the time, place and circumstances of our former acquaintance, which enables us to speak with confidence as to the identity of the person; not upon this information, but upon our own recollection thus refreshed, although time may have made a considerable change in his features. One speaking confidently, under such circumstances, would be entitled to belief, in a degree little, if any, less than one who had a daily and intimate intercourse with the person in question.

334 *I think the proof of the other witness, incompetent. Although he had seen Redford write, he does not profess to be acquainted with his hand-writing, and declares that his belief is founded on comparison with other writings, which he knows to be genuine; but could not say, that such would be his belief, except from such comparison. His evidence is nothing more than would be that of any other, who compared the writings proved by this witness to be genuine, with the writing in question. I am not however, prepared to say, that in a question of Probate, such a comparison might not be made between writings admitted, or clearly proved (by witnesses above exception, and who had seen them written,) to be genuine, with the writing in question. Such evidence has, it seems, been usually admitted in the Courts of Probate in England, and they have even called to their assistance in making the comparison, experienced Proctors. There seems to be a difference between submitting such papers for comparison, to the inspection of a Jury, (which cannot be done,) whose judgment on the fact cannot be revised, and to a Court of Probate, whose judgment in that particular may be revised. There is, however, no occasion to consider this question in this cause, since no such comparison was made in the Court below; the receipts, spoken of by the witness, not being produced.

This, then, presents the question, whether such a Testament can be established, upon the proof of one witness.

The Ecclesiastical Courts of England have jurisdiction of the Probate of Testaments of personals, and proceed, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, according to the Civil Law in respect to Testaments; with this difference, that abandoning the solemnities prescribed by the Civil Law in ordinary cases, they adopted the rules of the Civil Law as to Military Testaments, and applied those rules to all cases indiscriminately. By the Civil Law, soldiers in actual service might make testamentary dispositions, without any solemnity whatever, even without writing, and 335 might revoke *them in like manner. They might die intestate in part, and in part testate; they might appoint a temporary heir; they might pretermitt their own children, and might call any number of witnesses to their Will, many or few, so that there were a sufficient number to prove the fact of the Will, according to the general rule of the Civil Law, which required two witnesses to establish any fact. These privileges were allowed to no others. Vultei (or Vultijus) in Institut. 262, sec. 4.* This was the out line of the English Law; and hence the power to dispose of personal property by nuncupative Wills was unlimited, until restrained by the Statute of Frauds of the 29th Car. 2, except as to soldiers and seaman, who were unrestrained by that Statute. 1 Rob. on Wills, 161. Both before and after this Statute, any scrap of paper not signed by the Testator, whether written by himself or another, might be established as a written Will, if it could be proved to have been written or approved by the Testator, animo testandi; and even after the Statute of Wills of Hen. 8, the principles of the Ecclesiastical Law were applied to Wills of land, before the Statute of Frauds; the Common Law Courts only requiring, that it should be in writing, no matter by whom written, nor whether it was signed by the Testator, and attested by witnesses subscribing their names, or not. See the cases collected by Roberts on Wills, 15, 22, 149, 156. The total absence of all solemnity in making testamentary dispositions, which prevailed, was a strong reason for enforce-ing the Civil Law rule, that such Testaments could not be established, any more than any other fact, by less than two witnesses to the facts necessary to prove the Will. Otherwise, a single person might dispose of the estate of a decedent, by writing himself any paper, and testifying that it was written by the direction of the deceased, and approved by him as his Will. Accordingly, there is no rule better established in England, than that as a general rule, no Testament can be established upon the evidence of a less number of 336 witnesses than two. *Whether there is an exception in the case of an olograph Will, will be the subject of enquiry hereafter.

Bracton lays down the rule in express terms, B. 2, ch. 26, sec. 2, "Fieri debet testamentum liberi hominis, coram duobus vel pluribus viris legalibus et honestis, clericis vel laicis, ad hoc specialiter convocatis." In repeated instances, attempts have been made to compel the Ecclesiastical Courts to admit Wills to Probate, upon the proof of one witness, by prohibition; which has been uniformly denied by the Courts of Common Law, upon the ground, that this being a matter of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, it belongs exclusively to them; and according to their Law, a Will cannot be proved by less than two witnesses. Many cases to this effect are collected in all the Abridgements, under the title Prohibition, which it is unnecessary to examine particularly, since all the Elementary Writers agree that this is the general rule.

Upon the settlement of Virginia, all the Laws of England, Common, Statutory, Chancery, Maritime, of Merchants, and Ecclesiastical, so far as they were suited to the circumstances of the society, were introduced with the Colonists. The jurisdiction for the administration of all these Laws, was vested originally in the General Court, consisting of the Governor and Council, and has been gradually distributed, as convenience required, amongst the various Courts established from time to time; but, the transfer of jurisdiction left the principles upon which it was administered, unchanged, and unimpaired. I cannot doubt that the Courts of Virginia, having the Probate of Testaments of persons, were always, and are now, bound to proceed according to the Ecclesiastical Law upon that subject, that being as much a part of the Common Law in its enlarged sense, as it has been adopted here, as the Law Merchant or Chancery Law. The security against fraud, intended by the requisition of two witnesses, was as necessary here as in England. This doctrine, and upon these principles, has been affirmed in Pennsylvania, in the case of Lewis v. Maris, 1 Dall. 278.

337 *The case of Glasscock v. Smither & Hunt, 1 Call. 479, is supposed, and at first view seems, to be contrary. But a careful examination of the report, and the original record, and the manuscript note of Judge Pendleton, the President of the Court, will show that this question was not considered or intended to be decided. The paper presented as the last Will, was not written or signed by the Testator; but, a single word was interlined with his own hand. At the same time, a Will previously made and duly executed, was also presented; and the Court below held, that the last paper was not such a "subsequent Will, Codicil, or Declaration in writing," however proved, as would, under the Act of Assembly, be sufficient to revoke a former Will duly executed. At least, this was considered as the ground of the Judgment by the Court of Appeals, as appears from Mr. Pendleton's note; and is indicated by the Judgment of the Court, which was pronounced, not on evidence given to the Court of Appeals, (as it must have been, if the validity of the second Will had been in question,) but on the record only. In the first case, the Will must have been finally established or rejected; but, the case was sent back, that the paper might be recorded as a Will, unless it was contested on some other ground. Other than what? Than that it was not a sufficient Will, Codicil, or Declaration in writing, however proved, to revoke the former Will.

The question remains, whether there is in this respect, any distinction between a Will wholly written by the Testator and others. There seems to have been a distinction by the Civil Law, in the case of Military Testaments, between written and unwritten Testaments. "De militis voluntate, constare potest etiam sine testibus, ex scriptura ipsius; quod si in nulla appareat scriptura nuncupata ejus voluntas, duobus minimum testibus probanda est, non quo modo et qua forma testamentum factum sit, sed testamentum factum esse." Vultei, (or Vultajus) 263, sec. 1. The 338 difference seems to me to have consisted *in this; that if the Will was nuncupative, it was necessarily to be proved by at least two witnesses called upon to witness that such was his Will; in the words of Bracton, "ad hoc specialiter convocatis;" but if written, then, whether written by the Testator, or only signed by him, the mere fact of his writing or signing it, proved by any witnesses, (by proving his hand-writing or otherwise, whether they knew it to be, or were called upon to witness it as his Will, or not,) was sufficient to establish it as a Will; but that two were indispensably necessary to that end, as in all other cases to establish any fact whatever. The declaration of Swinburne, p. 300, that if a Will be wholly written, or only subscribed by the Testator, it will be good without any witnesses at all, can only mean that no subscribing witnesses, nor any called specially to witness that such a Will had been made, were necessary; but that in that case, proof that the Testator had written or subscribed the paper purporting to be a Will, by any person who neither saw him write or sign it, nor heard him declare that it was his Will, or that he had made or signed any Will, would be sufficient proof that it was his Will. It surely did not mean, that no proof of the writing or subscribing, was necessary; for, without such proof, the Court could not know that it was written or subscribed by him. In giving the proof of the fact of writing or subscribing, two witnesses were necessary to establish the fact, as any other fact in the Ecclesiastical Court. "Unius responsio testis omnino non audiatur." Cod. 4, 20, 9.

It is said, however, by Roberts, p. 199, that where the Will has been wholly written by the Testator, and there are corroborating circumstances, the clear testimony of one witness has prevailed in the Ecclesiastical Court. He cites no authority for this; and if it is so held, this is probably a relaxation of the Civil Law rule, as it is relaxed in the Court of Chancery, allowing the Defendant's Answer to be overruled by one witness and strong corroborating circumstances. Roberts also states, that 339 it is said that one subscribing *witness is sufficient, but, for this he refers to no authority. In Twaite v. Smith, 1 P. Wms. 10, a Will, proved by one subscribing witness, failed simply on the ground, that there was but one such; the other two being incompetent.

It is however, I think, unnecessary in this case to enquire, how far the original rule requiring two witnesses in all cases, (which, considering the total want of solemnity in the execution of Testaments, ought not; in general, to be departed from,) has been relaxed in England, when the Will is wholly written by the Testator, or signed by him in the presence of one subscribing witness, or how far, in the latter case, the rule should be relaxed here; since I think our legislation has a decisive effect upon the question, as to an olograph Will. Such a Will of lands may be established under our Statute, by the proof of one uncontradicted and unimpeached witness; and this is such a legislative declaration that such proof is sufficient for any Will, as, I think, binds the Court conclusively. The maxim, omne majus continet in se minus, might be well applied.

But it was argued, that as in the case of Eagleton v. Kingston, 8 Ves. 438, so in this, the custody of the paper, and the declarations of the Testator, were sufficient to show, that although written by him, it was either improperly procured from his imbecility, or was not made animo testandi. It seems to me, that the fact is directly the reverse; and that the circumstances show clearly, that it was written as and for his last Will; and in pursuance of a long settled determination in respect to the disposition of his property. The facts relied upon by the Appellant, are, first, that upon an examination of the Testator's papers, by various persons examining different parcels at the same time, the paper in question was not found; that they were thrown loose into a box, which was carried to a neighbour's by one of the slaves emancipated by the Will and the paper afterwards found upon the top of the 340 papers in the *box; there being a crack in it, through which the paper could have been introduced, although it was locked. From this it is inferred, that the paper was in the possession of the slave who carried the box. If the paper was in the box, with the other papers belonging to the Testator, it was in the proper custody; and I think it very probable, that the examination was very hasty and careless, from the manner in which it was made. But if it were really in the possession of the slave, that was no improper custody, but where (if that slave was one in whom the Testator had confidence,) it might well be expected to be found. The testator was a very old and infirm man, without any family, or any one living with him but his slaves. The object of emancipating them, was steadily in his mind for several years; and he might well suppose, that his Will in the hands of one of them, would be safer than with his other papers, which, after his death, might fall into the hands of some one interested, to suppress the Will, which had no provision in it, but to emancipate his slaves. If this were the case, the fact that the slave having the custody of the Will, slipped it into the box, may well be accounted for by the embarrassment, which one ignorant and friendless, and of that class, might feel, as to the proper course to be pursued on such an occasion.

Another circumstance relied on, is, that another paper, dated two years after the paper in question, purporting to be signed and written by the Testator, was produced by another of his negroes, who said he had found it near the gate; and which H. Watkins, the witness who proved the Will of December, 1818, to be in the Testator's hand-writing, declared he did not believe to be in the Testator's hand-writing. This paper, in which the words are very badly spelled, and some of them not written with all the letters belonging to them, and in broken sentences, purports to be a Will written in three successive paragraphs, each signed G. Redford, and the first and last dated on the same day. It is hardly intelligible, but may be decyphered.

341 *It gives to Betsey Forlines a mare; and her colt, if she had one, to Jane; a gig and a gig-mare to Lucy Davis; all the cows, to Joseph and Benjamin Davis, except one to Mrs. Jordan; and L. Davis to keep all the cows she already has. It recites, that he is very weak and sick, and sets all his negroes free in each of the paragraphs, and leaves $5 to be equally divided at his death, between Mary and Daniel; and requests Joseph and Lucy Davis to see them righted and set free. This paper is dated only a few days before the Testator's death. His Will was offered for Probate on the 21st of December; and it was some days after his death, that the Will was found. I have myself, little doubt, that this paper was also written by the Testator, and given to one of the negroes, when he was, as it states, very sick and weak, and at broken intervals. The spelling is very bad in the papers proved unquestionably to have been written by him. He was very old and infirm when he wrote the Will in question in 1818; and his hand-writing had then materially changed, though retaining enough of its original character to be identified by those who had before known it. Two years after, upon the eve of dissolution, the character of his writing might well be supposed to have so changed, that none could affirm that they believed it to be his. If this was a forgery, it affords no presumption that the former was so; for, the person who could have imitated his hand-writing in 1818, and write intelligibly in his name, could surely have imitated it as well, and written as intelligibly in 1820, as before. He would never have fabricated such a production as that of 1820, when that of 1818, having the same effect was in existence.

Another circumstance relied on, is, that the Testator had frequently declared his hostility to free negroes, and that he would not emancipate any of his, and wished that there were no free negroes in the State. This may be well accounted for. In 1803, he had executed a paper in the form of a Deed of Emancipation of one of his negroes, which he had kept by him until his death, and which appears to have been intended to operate as a Will; for he desires, that "the said Will be by the Court set free; and that E. Maxcy and H. Maxcy as to the carrying the same into effect;" and noted at the foot, "the above is done at the request of them that is no more." In May, 1811, he made a Will, afterwards cancelled, by which he gave to his wife a part of his slaves for her life, and then to be free, and if they could not be permitted to stay in the State, he requested his brother to carry them to the county of Shelby, in Kentucky; to enable him to do which, they were to serve him five years. All the rest were to be immediately free; and if they could not stay in the State, to serve his brother five year, except Will, the one mentioned in the Deed of 1803, (then only 12 year old,) who was to serve four years; and each to have $5 out of his estate, and his small cart and horse to enable them to remove; his brother living in Shelby county, Kentucky. He gave his land to his wife for life, and the balance of his property absolutely, but made no further disposition of his land, and begs his Executors, Eliash Maxcy and Josiah Forlines, to use their best endeavours to fulfil his desire, by "trying the Assembly to git them suffered to stay in this Commonwealth, as many of them have husbands and wives to leave behind him, and they are industrious and honest any other slaves." This was in the Testator's own hand-writing, and without a witness.

One of the Testator's negro women had a free negro for a husband, who is proved to have been a bad and troublesome man; and in consequence of this connection, he sold her in January, 1812. This accounts for his expressions of hostility to free negroes, made subsequently. On the other hand, it is proved, that he was very tender to his slaves, and seemed to feel much for them when distressed; and that the year before he died, he told a witness that he had made a Will in his wife's life-time, in which he had given her six or seven negroes; but that since his wife's death, he had made another Will.

343 "It is impossible to examine the documents and evidence in this cause, without a perfect conviction, that the writing in question is written by the Testator himself, as and for his last Will, and in pursuance of a long settled determination to that effect. The word emancipate, is uniformly spelled in the same way, in the confessedly genuine writings of the Testator 1803, and 1811, and in that in question, "immanycypate;" and the general character of the composition and phraseology of all these papers are the same, the peculiarity of omitting many of the smaller words is alike in all. But above all, there is a perfect identity of objects in all. In his first Will, of 1811, his wife and negroes were the sole objects of his bounty. He left the reversion of his lands after his wife's death, undisposed of. In his last, his wife being dead, his whole care was for the emancipation of his negroes; and he left all the rest of his property undisposed of. He knew there was some obstacle to emancipated slaves remaining in Virginia; and in the Deed, he appoints persons to solicit the Court to set Will free; and in the two Wills, he provides, that if the General Assembly will not permit his slaves to stay here, they shall be carried to another State, at the expense of his estate, in part by the first Will, and in whole by the last.

The last objection is, that the Will is imperfect; the Testator not having done all he intended to do, as he concludes the writing, "Witness my hand and seal," and failed to affix his seal. This, I think, entitled to no weight; and upon the whole I am clear and confident in the opinion, that the Judgment should be affirmed.

JUDGE COALTER.

This is a case of considerable consequence on the subject of the Probate of Wills, and ought to be examined with caution and deliberation.

344 "If I could be satisfied that Claiborne

Watkins's testimony was competent, it would relieve me from the consideration of other questions, as to which I have some difficulty. This Will is offered as one altogether in the hand-writing of the Testator. It has never been published in the presence of any witness. It is not enough to prove that the signature is in the hand-writing of the Testator; the proof must go to the hand-writing of the whole Will.

A Testament of chattels, written in the Testator's own hand, though it has neither his name nor seal to it, nor witnesses present at its publication, is good, provided sufficient proof can be had that it is his hand-writing. 2 Black. Com. 502. What is sufficient proof of this? According to the Canon Law, which is recognized as obligatory on the Common Law Courts, the proof of hand-writing, as well as any other fact, before a Court of Probate, must be by two witnesses. Lea v. Libb, 3 Salk. 396; Twaites v. Smith, 1 P. Wms. 10; Shotton v. Friend, 2 Salk. 547. This is the Law of England, and was our Law also, obligatory on our Court of Probate, and now obligatory on them, unless it has been altered, as to Wills in the hand-writing of the Testator, by some Statute.

If there are two witnesses in this case to the hand-writing, we are relieved from the enquiry, whether there has been any alteration in this respect, by our Statute.

Henry W. Watkins is undoubtedly one competent witness as to the hand-writing, not only of the signature, but of the whole body of the Will. Is C. Watkins a witness as to either? He says, that he has frequently seen the Testator write his name to receipts, and believes, from comparison, that the paper in controversy with the signature, is wholly in the hand-writing of the Testator; believes he should not have been able to prove the hand-writing of the Testator, except from comparison with the signature to the receipts aforesaid. This is the whole of his evidence as to the hand-writing.

345 *If his evidence is competent, then, whether it is entitled to much or little weight, is not the question now under consideration. There would be two competent witnesses as to the hand-writing, and then the only remaining question would be, as to the sufficiency of the whole evidence to establish the Will. He does not profess to have seen the Testator ever write any thing, except his signature, which he had frequently seen him write; yet, he testifies to the whole body of the Will signature and all. Had he confined his testimony to the signature alone, which, in a case of a Will of chattles, would not be a necessary part of the Will, and had said nothing about the hand-writing of the body of the Will, it could not perhaps be said that there were two witnesses to the hand-writing of the body of the Will. A witness, who has only seen a party write his name, may not be able to form an opinion as to the hand-writing of the body of the paper, which, in this case, it is necessary to prove; proof merely of the signature not being enough. But here, the witness undertakes to speak of the hand-writing of the body of the Will, as well as of that of the name subscribed; and although his opinion might not be entitled to very great weight it is still legal and competent evidence, if there is no other valid objection to it. A witness may have very full knowledge of the hand-writing, or he may have seen him write only a few words, and only once. The weight of the evidence is one thing; its competency is another. 1 Phill. Evid. 422. But he says, from comparison, he believes it to be his hand-writing; believes he could not have proved the hand-writing, except from comparison with the signatures to the receipts. What kind of comparison he made, does not appear. It does not appear that the receipts were in Court; so that he made the comparison when he gave his evidence. If such was the fact, and if that would alter the case, it ought to have appeared in the Bill of Exceptions. There can be no doubt, I presume, that if a witness knows he is about to be examined

346 as to hand-writing, and *has frequently seen the party write, and has in his possession papers that he saw him write, and looks at them so as to refresh his memory as to the character and manner of writing, and then deposes, that this would not destroy his testimony. A witness is called on to identify a man he had before known; but, before he sees him, he looks at a picture which he recognizes to be a likeness; which recalls the features and expression of countenance, and notwithstanding alterations by age, &c. he testifies to his identity. He might have been able to identify him, without having looked at the picture; yet, he may think, that was a material aid to him in doing so. He knew him, however, formerly; and on the whole, thinks he is the man. This would be a very different thing from the evidence of one, who never knew him, but who identifies him by a mere comparison with the picture. Why shall a man, because he has seen another write, be better able to judge of hand-writing, than he who is a good judge of writing, and who has on the trial, compared fair specimens of his writing with the paper in question? I suppose it is because he acquires a better knowledge of the character of the hand, by seeing him write, and has a knowledge of it previous to the dispute; and is not governed by a mere juxta-position, and comparison between paper, of which he had no previous knowledge. A witness may believe, that he cannot prove the hand-writing, having no recollection of it, until it is produced to him; and then, he knows it. A witness, having authentic writings in his possession, which he has not seen for many years, may believe that he cannot prove the hand-writing, until he sees those papers, and he may then recollect it. Had the witness said, that on seeing the receipts, though he knew them to have been signed by the Testator, he still had no recollection of the hand-writing, then he could have given no other evidence in the case, than any other judge of writing could have given; except to prove that the receipts produced had been signed by the Testator, so as to show that they 347 were fair *specimens of his signature, to compare by. If such was in reality, his testimony, it ought to have been so stated. He has certainly more knowledge on the subject than one who saw him write; and therefore, I cannot say he is incompetent, merely because he had looked at writings known to be writings of the Testator, unless he had gone on to say, that having done so, he still had no recollection of his hand, and spoke entirely from comparing the one writing with the other; in which case both ought to have been before him at the time he testified; as must have been the case, had the comparison been made by one who never saw him write. It does not appear, nor can it be presumed in this case, that he had had the Will at his house, and compared the writings, or that he had compared them together in the Clerk's office where it seems this paper had been lodged for some time before the trial.

On the whole, it seems to me, though not without some doubt that however small the weight due to this evidence, it was competent, and that consequently there were two witnesses to the hand-writing.

This relieves me from the necessity of deciding positively, the very important question, whether, because our Act of Assembly, 1 Rev. Code, 375, has made a Will, if written altogether by the Testator, a good Will of lands, that the intention was to alter the Law as to the number of witnesses necessary to establish such Will.

As at present advised, however, I cannot think it was the intention of the Legislature to lessen the guards theretofore existing as to the proof of Wills. It requires two subscribing witnesses as to Wills of lands, where not so written by the Testator; leaving the Law as to personals as it stood before, to wit, that the witnesses need not subscribe, and that the testator need not sign such Will. In other respects, they were left equal, the Law requiring no greater number of witnesses as to Wills of real estates, than those of personals. If Wills of lands were proved here as in England, merely before the Courts of 348 Common Law, some "argument might be made, that the Common Law mode of proof was intended. But, the same tribunals are to take jurisdiction of Probates of Wills of lands as of personals; and if it was intended to place Wills of lands on a different footing from those of personals, where written by the Testator, or to alter the Law as to the kind of proof in the latter case, it seems to me it would not have been left to mere implication. The man who forges the Will, may prove it.

From the view I have taken of this case, it is perhaps not necessary for me to do more than to suggest my present impressions as to this point.

In addition to the two witnesses in this case, there are strong corroborative circumstances in favor of this Will, which I need not recapitulate. One has had a good deal of bearing on my mind. The Testator, in all the Wills and instruments which have been produced, has shown an intention to do his own writing. He has never called on any one else to write for him. This shows, that he was apprised that a Will in his own hand-writing was good without witnesses.

The sentence of the Superior Court must be affirmed.

JUDGE CABELL.

It is essential to the proof of hand-writing, that the witness shall be acquainted with the hand-writing which he is called on to establish. The mere fact of having seen a person write, if it did not impart an acquaintance with the hand-writing, is of no importance whatever. I am, therefore, of opinion, that Claiborne Watkins was an incompetent witness.

Upon the other points in the cause, I concur in opinion with Judge Green; and he has gone so fully into them, as to leave me nothing new to add.

I am of opinion, to affirm the Judgment.

I. PROOF OF HANDWRITING.

1. MODE OF PROOF GENERALLY.

Must Have Knowledge of Writing.—To render a person a competent witness to testify to the hand-writing of another, it is not sufficient to show the receipt of friendly letters purporting to come from such person alone, but some admission or acquiescence equivalent to an acknowledgment that such person was the writer of the letters must be shown independent of their receipt and contents. Flowers v. Fletcher, 40 W. Va. 103, 20 S. E. Rep. 871.

Evidence Must Be Direct.—And it is not proper for a witness to state, in a prosecution for forgery, that "he is perfectly familiar with the hand-writing of the accused," stating the circumstances which make him so, and "expresses the confident opinion from his knowledge of accused's hand-writing that he was incapable of writing the order" in question. Burress v. Com., 27 Gratt. 948.

Having Seen Party Write.—A witness who had seen party write, is a competent witness to prove his hand-writing, though some years had passed since he saw him write, and he could not be positive in his statements. Chahoon v. Com., 20 Gratt. 732.

And so, a witness is competent to prove hand-writing who saw the party write only once, and who states that he would not be able from his knowledge to distinguish it from that of others; but that his opinion was, from a comparison, that the hand-writing was the same. Pepper v. Barnett, 23 Gratt. 405. See Hanriot v. Sherwood, 82 Va. 14; Flowers v. Fletcher, 40 W. Va. 103, 20 S. E. Rep. 871; Chahoon v. Com., 20 Gratt. 732.

Having Never Seen Party Write.—It is competent to prove by a witness who has never seen testator write, but who has acquired a knowledge of his hand-writing from examination of his papers, that the will is in the hand-writing of testator. Sharp v. Sharp, 2 Leigh 254.

And a witness is competent to testify who has never seen the alleged author of the paper in dispute write, and whose impressions are drawn from recollections of orders seen by him casually in the way of business thirteen years before. The weight of such testimony is for the consideration of the jury. Cody v. Conly, 27 Gratt. 323. See Flowers v. Fletcher, 40 W. Va. 103, 20 S. E. Rep. 871.

Witness Who Had Seen Paper in Question.—Also, a witness who has seen the paper in question, but who has it not before him at the time, is competent to prove the hand-writing, and this too, without distinct proof that the paper he saw and the paper in question are the same. Nuckols v. Jones, 8 Gratt. 273.

Maker and Attesting Witness Being Dead.—Where the writing in dispute was attested by a witness who made his mark and since died, it was proper, under the circumstances, to establish the due execution of the paper to prove the hand-writing of the deceased party executing it. Gilliam v. Perkinson, 4 Rand. 325. See Raines v. Phillips, 1 Leigh 423; Hanriot v. Sherwood, 82 Va. 1; Steptoe v. Flood, 31 Gratt. 322.

Handwriting of Propounder of Will.—And it is held, where the genuineness of a holograph will is in question, contestant may prove by witnesses acquainted with the handwriting of propounder, but not with testator's, that the will is in the handwriting of such propounder. Brown v. Hall, 85 Va. 156, 7 S. E. Rep. 182.

Refreshing Memory by Other Writings.—The evidence of a witness as to handwriting, who has formed an acquaintance with it from seeing the party write, or from a course of correspondence, is not rendered incompetent, nor its weight impaired by his having referred for the purpose of refreshing his memory, to papers in his own possession, known to be written by the party. Redford v. Peggy, 6 Rand. 816.

Who May Prove Instrument a Forgery.—On a prosecution for forgery, proof that the instrument is a forgery may be had upon the evidence of others than the party whose signature is forged, and without accounting for his absence. Foulkes v. Com., 2 Rob. 841.

a. By Comparison.

(1) Comparison by Experts.—Under the rules of evidence in this state expert testimony is admissible to test the genuineness of disputed writings by comparison of writings admitted or proved to be genuine with writings alleged to be forged. Hanriot v. Sherwood, 82 Va. 1; Tower v. Whip (W. Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 179.

And in an action on promissory note, when defendant denies the execution of it, an expert on handwriting may compare the signature to the note with the defendant's signature with pleas signed and sworn to and filed by him, and expressed his opinion whether the same person made the signature to notes and pleas. Tower v. Whip (W. Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 179. See Hanriot v. Sherwood, 82 Va. 1.

(2) Comparison by Nonexperts.—The evidence of a witness who has frequently seen a testator write his name to receipts, and who has resorted to those receipts before he gives his evidence, to refresh his memory, as to the handwriting, but who testified he believes the body of the will and signature to be the handwriting of the testator, though he forms that belief from comparison and that he would not be able to prove the handwriting, except from comparing it with the signature to the said receipts, was competent evidence to prove the handwriting. Redford v. Peggy, 6 Rand. 816.

And a witness who has seen the party write but once, and who admits his knowledge of the handwriting is very imperfect may compare the disputed writing with that he had seen written, and give an opinion thereon. Pepper v. Barnett, 22 Gratt. 406.

(3) Comparison by the Jury.—On the trial of issue on a plea of non est factum whether the party's signature to the instrument in question be genuine or not, it is inadmissible to lay other proved specimens of the party's handwriting before the jury, that it may judge by comparison whether the writing in question be genuine. Such comparison of handwriting is not proper evidence. Rowt v. Kile, 1 Leigh 216. See Clay v. Robinson, 7 W. Va. 362; Clay v. Alderson, 10 W. Va. 51. Compare Hanriot v. Sherwood, 82 Va. 1.

But, upon a trial for uttering a forged receipt, witnesses may testify as to the handwriting in the alleged forged receipt; and being acquainted with the signature of the person's name purporting to be signed thereto, may before the jury, make the letters of such person's name as they think he makes them, and the jury may compare such letters so made, with the letters in the alleged signature. State v. Henderson, 29 W. Va. 147, 1 S. E. Rep. 235.

Upon such trial the jury will not be permitted to receive the proved, and not admitted signature of the person, when none had been alleged to have been forged, so as to permit them to compare the two signatures. Much less would it be proper to permit evidence to go to the jury by a witness that he had compared the alleged forged signature with one admitted to be genuine, and they were exactly alike. State v. Henderson, 29 W. Va. 147, 1 S. E. Rep. 235.

Nor, upon the trial of an indictment for forgery, when it becomes necessary to prove the genuine signature of the party whose name is alleged to have been forged, is it admissible to give in evidence to the jury the genuine signature of such party, although written in the presence of the jury, that they may judge by comparing the same in whole or in part with any part of the alleged forged signature, whether the party who made the forged signature tried to imitate any part of the genuine signature of the party whose name is alleged to have been forged. State v. Koontz, 81 W. Va. 127, 5 S. E. Rep. 828.

(4) Comparison by the Court.—Quare, is it competent for a probate court to compare the handwriting of the papers in question with that of papers produced in court, admitted to be genuine, or proved to be so? And is not the rule in a probate court different from that in trials before a jury? Redford v. Peggy, 6 Rand. 816.

b. Proof of In Actions under Statute.—In a suit against the assignor of a bond the handwriting of the assignor prior to his own need not be proved upon the trial of the case. McWilliams v. Smith, 1 Call 123.

For, the statute, dispensing with proof of handwriting in certain cases only applies where the declaration alleges that the defendant, or the person stated to have made the writing, subscribed his name thereto. Kelly v. Paul, 3 Gratt. 191. See Shepherd v. Frys, 3 Gratt. 442; Clason v. Parrish, 93 Va. 24, 24 S. E. Rep. 471.

And, in an action of debt at common law, on a negotiable note, the plea of nil debit put in issue the execution of the note, and all transfers thereof, but, by statute, when the execution and endorsement of the note are averred in the declaration, no proof thereof is required, unless an affidavit be filed with the pleadings putting it in issue, denying that such endorsement, etc., or other writing was made by the person charged therewith or by anyone thereto authorized by him. Clason v. Parrish, 93 Va. 24, 24 S. E. Rep. 471. See Phaup v. Stratton, 9 Gratt. 619; Maxwell v. Burbridge, 44 W. Va. 248, 28 S. E. Rep. 703; Robinson v. Dix, 18 W. Va. 528; James River, etc., v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 53; Code of Va., § 3379; Code of W. Va., ch. 125, § 40.

So, also, where a defendant in chancery, in his answer, alleges that plaintiff's decedent delivered his three receipts to respondent for money paid him on account of the matter in controversy, and files with his answer, as a part thereof, what purports to be the original receipts, such receipts will be regarded as genuine, without any proof of the handwriting, unless the fact that such receipts were made by plaintiff's decedent is denied by affidavit. Maxwell v. Burbridge, 44 W. Va. 248, 28 S. E. Rep. 703; Clason v. Parrish, 93 Va. 24, 24 S. E. Rep. 471; Phaup v. Stratton, 9 Gratt. 619; Robinson v. Dix, 18 W. Va. 528; James River, etc., v. Littlejohn, 18 Gratt. 53; Code of Va., § 3379; Code of W. Va., ch. 125, § 40.

c. Burden of Proof.—Where bill or other pleadings sets up a writing and alleges that it was made and signed by defendant's intestate in his lifetime, and defendant denies, by answer under oath, the allegations, and demands proof, such answer puts the genuineness of the writing in issue, and throws the burden of proof on the allegor. Harnsberger v.

Cochran, 88 Va. 727, 1 S. E. Rep. 120. See Swecker v. Swecker, 87 Va. 306, 12 S. E. Rep. 1056.

d. Sufficient to Submit Case to Jury.—And, on the plea of non est factum, proof of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, and that they are dead, is sufficient to submit the case to the jury. Bogle v. Sullivan, 1 Call 561.

349 *Thomas M. Cowling, v. The Justices of Nansemond County.

Judgments—Finality—Appeal.—*—Though a Judgment of a Superior Court of Law, reversing a Judgment of a County Court, and directing other pleadings in the cause, be interlocutory in its character, yet the finality of the Judgment in the County Court imparts its character to the Judgment of the Superior Court, so as to authorize an appeal to the Court of Appeals.

Executors—Official Bond—Material Defects.—The official bond of an Executor, in the penalty of which the names of the obligees are not inserted, and in the condition of which the name of the Executor, and of the Court to which he was to return the account of his transactions are blank, is materially defective, and no Judgment can be rendered on it at Law.

An imperfect bond, purporting to be an executor's bond, was executed by the Appellant and other obligors, in Nansemond County Court on the 10th October, 1803. The following is a copy of the instrument so executed: "Know all men by these presents, that we, William Coffield, Thomas M. Cowling, and Willis Coffield, are held and firmly bound unto Gentlemen, Justices of the Court of County, now sitting, in the sum of four thousand dollars, payment whereof well and truly to be made to the said Justices, and their successors, we bind ourselves, and each of us, our and each of our heirs, Executors, and Administrators, jointly and severally firmly by these presents. Sealed with our seals this 10th day of October, Anno. Dom. one thousand eight hundred, and three, & in the year of the Commonwealth.

"The Condition of this obligation is, that if the said William Coffield executor of the last Will and Testament Willis Coffield deceased, do make a true and perfect inventory of all and singular the goods, chattels, and credits of the said deceased which have or shall come to the hands, possession, or knowledge of the said cr into the hands, or possession of any other person or persons for and the same so made do 350 exhibit *into the Court, at such time as shall be thereto required by the said Court, and the same goods, chattels and credits do well and truly administer according to Law, and do make a just and true account of acting and doings therein when thereunto required by the said Court, and further do well and truly pay and deliver all the legacies contained, and specified in the said Will, as far as the said goods, chattels, and credits will extend according to the value thereof, and as the Law shall charge; then this obligation to be void, else to remain in full force.

William Coffield, (L. S.)

Thomas M. Cowling, (L. S.)

Willis Coffield, (L. S.)

"Sealed and delivered in the presence of,"

Debt was brought on this bond in the name of Jeremiah Godwin, surviving obligee of Robert M. Riddick, William Summer, and Fisher Daabiel, Justices of the Peace of the Court of Nansemond County aforesaid, at the relation of Samuel Carrol, Administrator de bonis non, with the Will annexed of Willis Coffield deceased, against the above mentioned obligor, Cowling, to recover the sum of $1,169, found due from the said executor to the estate of his Testator, by the Commissioners appointed to settle his accounts.

The Declaration recited the bond as being made to the "said obligees;" that is, the persons before named as Justices of Nansemond County, and recited the condition as importing an obligation on the part of the Executor to make a just, and true account of his actings and doings, when required by the said Court of Nansemond County. It further averred, however, "that although the obligation aforesaid does not show the names of the obligees, or persons to whom the same was executed, yet the obligees aforesaid are those to whom, and in whose favor the said obligation was made and executed, as by the records and proceedings remaining in the 351 Clerk's Office of the said *County of Nansemond, (besides other evidence) will manifestly appear."

The Defendant Cowling, cravedoyer of the writing obligatory, and also of the condition thereof, and demurred to the Declaration, for the following causes: 1st. Because there are no obligees actually named in the penalty of the said writing obligatory; 2dly. Because in the condition, the name of the Executor, as well as the name of the Court into which he would have been bound to exhibit an account of his Executorial transactions, are omitted to be inserted; 3dly. Because the condition omits to designate and point out who shall render an account of his actings and doings as Executor as aforesaid when thereunto required. 4thly. Because there is a variance between the Bond and Declaration. There was a joinder in demurrer, and the County Court gave Judgment for the Defendant.

The Plaintiff obtained a Supersedeas, and the Superior Court of Law reversed the Judgment of the County Court, and ordered all the proceedings subsequent to the Writ of Enquiry to be set aside, and proceeding to give such Judgment as the County Court ought to have given, overruled the demurrer, directed that the Defendant below should answer over, and remanded the cause to the County Court for further proceedings to be had therein, and gave Judgment for the Plaintiffs costs in the Superior Court.

To that Judgment, the Defendant obtained a Supersedeas from a Judge of this Court.

Scott, for the Defendant in Error.

May 3. The PRESIDENT delivered his opinion, in which the other Judges concurred.*

352 *Upon the preliminary question, whether the Supersedeas was properly awarded to the Judgment of the Superior Court, I think there can be no doubt; for, though that Judgment, reversing the Judgment of the County Court, and directing other pleadings in the cause, was interlocutory in its character, (though final there,) the Judgment of the County Court, being final as regards the jurisdiction of this Court, it imparted that character to the Judgment of the Superior Court, and an appeal will lay from it to this Court.

On the merits, I think there is as little doubt. A Relator in a suit on an official bond, ought to set out in the pleadings, his interest in, and claim to, relief upon it; which he has totally omitted in this case. On the demurrer to the Declaration, by over taken of the bond and condition, they became a part of it, and might be demurred to for any defect apparent on their face; and that is the ground of the special demurrer in this case. The two first points relate to defects in the bond and condition; as first, because there are no obligees named in the bond. Secondly, because in the condition, the name of the Executor, and of the Court into which he was to return the account of his transactions, are blank. In fact, the bond is only a copy of the blank bond to be found in the Act, except that the names of the obligors are inserted in the penal part of it. It is materially defective. Parties ought to be held to a reasonable strictness, or great injustice may be done. There can be no bond without an obligee; and it ought to be made to the sitting Justices at the time it is executed.

On all these grounds, not noticing some minor objections, I think that the Judgment of the Superior Court ought to be reversed, and that of the County Court affirmed.

May, 1828.

Assigned Bond—Debt on—Evidence—Payment to Assignor.—In debt on an assigned bond, the assignee being Plaintiff, if the Defendant pleads that he has paid the debt to the Plaintiff, (without pleading payment to the assignor before notice of the assignment,) it is not allowable to give in evidence any set-off against, or payment to, the assignor.

Debt by George Cabell, assignee of Benjamin Perkins, in the Superior Court of Law for Bedford county, against Archibald Hatcher, Edward Hatcher, and Hardaway Hatcher, on a bond, in the penalty of $5,527 62, conditioned to pay, on or before the 7th of March, 1819, the sum of $2,763 81, dated in April, 1818, executed by the said Hatchers to Perkins, and by him assigned to the Plaintiff. The Defendants pleaded, "that they have paid the debt, in the Declaration mentioned, to the Plaintiff." General replication, and issue. At the trial, the Defendants excepted to an opinion of the Court. The Bill of Exceptions sets forth, that on the trial of the cause, the Defendants' Counsel offered as a set-off to the Plaintiff's demand, two notes; the first of which is a negotiable note, dated Lynchburg, 17th January, 1819, executed by Benjamin Perkins to James W. Dibrell, promising to pay him, or order, ninety days after date, that the Farmers' Bank at Lynchburg, $1,795 57, endorsed by the said James W. Dibrell, John Moore, and Archibald Hatcher. This note was regularly protested at maturity, and the instrument of protest was also offered in evidence. The second note was in the following words: "For, and in consideration of the sum of $613 22, this day borrowed of James W. Dibrell, I hereby transfer and assign to him a bond, executed to me by A. and E. Hatcher, dated about 7th March, 1818, and payable twelve months after date, for $2,763 and cents, after deducting $2,000 for Dr. George Cabell, who now holds the said bond: when the said Dibrell collects the money, he is to pay himself the above $613 22, with interest, and the balance I am entitled to: This 30th March, 1819.

Benj. Perkins."

354 *With an endorsement, as follows: "I assign the within to A. Hatcher, for value received.

James W. Dibrell."

The Court refused to suffer the notes to go in evidence to the Jury, because it was proved by the Plaintiff, that in December, 1818, or January, 1819, the Defendant, A. Hatcher, had notice that the bond in the Declaration mentioned, had been assigned to the Plaintiff, and that in January or February, 1819, the Defendant, A. Hatcher acknowledged he had no set-off against the same, and there being no evidence offered to show that the whole bond was not assigned to the Plaintiff, other than the second mentioned paper alone.

Verdict and Judgment for the Plaintiff, from which the Defendants appealed.

Wickham, for the Appellants.

Johnson, for the Appellee.

May 5. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.†

The Judgment in this case, ought to be affirmed on the general objection, that the matter on which the questions in the Bill of Exceptions were raised, was not pertinent to the issue made up on the plea of payment to the Plaintiff only.

Statute of Descents—Effect on Common Law.—The Act of Descents of 1785, (since re-enacted at the Revisions of 1792 and 1819,) entirely repealed and abrogated the Common Law course of descents, and all the principles thereof.

†Absent. JUDGE COALTER. JUDGE CABELL, being related to one of the parties, did not sit in this case.

§Statute of Descents—Effect on Common Law.—The act of 1785 entirely repealed and abrogated the common-law course of descents, and all the principles thereof; its enactments stand in diametrical opposition to all the rules and canons of the common law; and it is a complete and perfect whole, containing within itself a provision for every case that their descendants, without a father, without a mother, brother, or sister, but having had a brother and a sister, both of whom died before him;) leaving a niece the only child of the brother, and two nephews, and two nieces, the children of the sister, the real estate of the intestate will descend, and the personal estate be distributed to all of these nieces and nephews per capita, and not per stirpes, they being all in the same degree of consanguinity to the intestate.

Same-Same-Same-Same-Same.—In such case, the estate will not be divided into moieties, to be given, one moiety to the child of the brother, according to the Common Law doctrine of jus representationis, and the other moiety to the four nephews and nieces, as representing their mother, but it will be divided into five equal parts, one to each of the nephews and nieces, each one taking jure proprio.

Same-Same-Same-Same-Same.—If in such case, the two nieces (children of the deceased sister,) be dead before the intestate, leaving the two nephews, and the niece, (the child of the brother) and one of those deceased nieces has left two children, and the other six children, the estate will still be divided into five parts: of which, one part will be allotted to the niece, (the daughter of the brother,) another part to each of the nephews, one other part to the two children of the deceased niece, as representing their mother, and the other fifth part to the six children as representing their mother; and this, on the principle contained in the 16th section, that if a part of those in the same degree be dead, and a part living, the issue of those dead shall take per stirpes, that is, the share of their deceased parent.

Same-Same-Same-Same-Same.—Although the 16th section of the Act does not provide in terms, for the case of a brother and sister dying before the intestate, and leaving an unequal number of children, and does not in words declare what portion of the inheritance shall descend to those children, yet the spirit of that section taken in connection with the 1st and 4th sections, justify the construction, that they will take per capita.

Same-Same-Same-Same-Same.—It is a just inference from this decision, that if a grand father die intestate, having had two children, A. and B., both of whom died before their father, but A. leaves one child, and B. six children, the estate of the grand-father will descend to all the grand children equally, and the child of A. will only get a seventh part, although if A. had been alive, and the other brother dead A. would have got a moiety, and the other moiety would have been divided between the six children of B., and so of all other cases of like kind.

Elizabeth M. Davis exhibited her Bill to the Chancellor for the Richmond District, setting forth that her uncle

356 *Anthony Gardner, died in the year 1819, intestate, and without issue, seized and possessed of real and personal estate: that his nephew James G. Rowe, administered on the estate. The intestate had had one brother, and one sister, but both of them died before him. The Complainant was the only child and heir of the brother. The sister left four children, two sons, James G. Rowe and Francis Rowe, both of whom are living, and two daughters, both of whom are dead, but each left children; one of the daughters, Mrs. Boyd, left two children, William B. Boyd, and Lucy Anne Boyd, who are still living; and the other daughter, Mrs. Shackleford, left six children, namely, Anthony G., Eliza R., Judith D., Mary Anne, Catharine T., and Martha Ellen Shackleford, who are still living. Such being the collateral kindred, and heirs of the intestate, the Complainant made them all parties to her Bills and sought a partition of the real estate, and distribution of the personal estate according to Law. The Complainant claimed, that the estate should be divided into moieties; that she, as representing her father, the deceased brother of the intestate, was entitled to one moiety. And that the other moiety should be divided into four parts, whereof James G. Rowe was entitled to one, Francis Rowe to one, and the two children of Mrs. Boyd to another, and the six children of Mrs. Shackleford to the other.

The defendants admitted that the Bill made a true statement of the collateral kindred and heirs of the intestate, but denied that, according to Law, the partition, and distribution could be made as sought for by the Bill.

The question depended on the construction of the Act of Descents, and particularly of the 1st, 4th and 16th sections of the Act. (1 Rev. Co. of 1792, ch. 93, p. 168: See also, 1 Rev. Co. of 1819, ch. 96.)

The Chancellor decreed that the estate, both real and personal, should be divided into five equal parts, and that one of those equal parts should be allotted to the 357 Plaintiff, Mrs. Davis, *another to the Defendant, James G. Rowe, another to the Defendant, Francis Rowe, another to the Defendants, William B. Boyd, and Lucy Anne Boyd, to be equally divided between them, and the other to the Defendants, the six children, by name, of Mrs. Shackleford, to be equally divided between them.

From this Decree, Mrs. Davis appealed to this Court. The following table of the collateral kindred of Dr. Anthony Gardner, will illustrate the relationship of the parties, to each other, and to the intestate.

JUDGE CARR.

This is a case arising on our Law of Descents, and involving a most important principle of construction. Anthony Gardner had a brother who had one daughter, (Mrs. Davis,) and a sister who had two sons, James and Francis Rowe, and two daughters, Mrs. Boyd and Mrs. Shackleford. The sister and brother of Anthony Gardner died before him, leaving these children. Mrs. Boyd and Mrs. Shackleford, also died in his life-time; the first leaving two children, the last six; and then Anthony Gardner died intestate and without issue, leaving estate real and personal. The question is, how shall this estate be divided between these eleven relations? For the Plaintiff, (Mrs. Davis,) it is contended, that our Statute has no provision by which we can adjust the proportions of the claimants, that we must therefore call in the aid of the Common Law, and by the jus representationis, placing Mrs. D. in the shoes of her father, give her half the estate, and divide the other moiety among the rest. For the Defendants it is contended, that the Common Law has been utterly abolished can arise. Garland v. Harrison, 8 Leigh 371. 397, citing the principal case to sustain the statement. To the same effect, the principal case was cited in Bennett v. Toler, 15 Gratt. 625; Greenhow v. James, 80 Va. 646; Medley v. Medley, 81 Va. 271. The principal case is also cited in Ball v. Ball, 27 Gratt. 327; Moore v. Conner, 2 Va. Dec. 66.

by the Statute, and can in no question of descents be invoked; that the Statute embraces this case, and under it the inheritance should be divided into five portions, one of which should be given to each of the nephews, one to the niece, and the other two to be divided between the descendants of Mrs. Boyd and Mrs. Shackelford. The Chancellor decreed to this effect, from which the appeal is taken. Perhaps a few preliminary remarks may enable us the better to understand the force, effect and extent of our Statute.

360 *From the date of our existence as a Colony, to the Revolution, the Common Law, regulating the descent of real estates, was the Law of the land. Of this Law the first Canon, as noticed by Blackstone, is, that inheritances shall lineally descend to the issue of the person who last died actually seized, in infinitum, but shall never lineally ascend: 2dly. That the male issue shall be admitted before the female: 3dly. That where there are two or more males in equal degree, the eldest only, shall inherit but the females all together: 4th. That the lineal descendants, in infinitum of any person deceased, shall represent their ancestor, that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done had he been living: 5th. That on failure of the lineal descendants or issue, of the person last seized, the inheritance shall descend to his collateral relations, being of the blood of the first purchaser: 6th. This collateral heir must be the next collateral kinsman of the whole blood. Every body knows that these Canons of descent are the creatures of the Feudal System, and, however calculated to support a Government like that of England, are in violation of natural affection, and repugnant to the free spirit of a republic. While the descent of real estate was thus carefully moulded by the Common Law, according to the spirit of the Feudal System, it took no thought of the personality; but left it to the control of a different system; for, where no Will appeared, the Ordinary had the absolute disposal of the personal estate; being not bound (further than in conscience,) to pay the debts of the intestate. The Statute of Westminster 2, ch. 19, 13th Edw. 1st, subjected the Ordinary to the suit of creditors, as Executors were. By 31st Edw. 3d, they were bound to grant Administration to the nearest and most lawful friends of the deceased: and this is the origin of Administrators, who were placed, by this Statute, on the footing of Executors. Still the Ecclesiastical Courts exercised jurisdiction 361 over the subject. They granted Administration, they called the Administrators to account, and undertook to distribute the surplus of the personal estate, among the kindred of the intestate, according to the rules of the Civil Law, de successoribus, ab intestato. And this was deemed so reasonable, that it was tolerated for a long time, and the Ordinaries, in the bonds taken of the Administrators to account with them, usually inserted a clause, that the overplus upon such account, should be distributed as the Ordinary should appoint.

This matter was at length brought before the Law Courts, and they decided that the bonds of the Administrator were of no avail and he not compellable to make distribution at all. And as often afterwards as the Ecclesiastical Courts attempted to compel a distribution, a prohibition was granted. In this state of things, the Statute of 22d and 23d Car. 2, commonly called the Statute of Distributions, was passed, at the instance of the Civilians. It is laid down in many cases, that the reason of passing this Law, was to end the contention between the Common Law and Ecclesiastical Courts: that its main scope was to enlarge the jurisdiction of the latter; that it was borrowed from the Civil Law, and to be construed according to the rules of that Code. The provisions of this Law stand in striking contrast with the Canons of Descent of the Common Law. Primogeniture, the preference of males over females, the blood of the first purchaser, the rule that property never ascends, the exclusion of the half blood; all these fundamental rules of the Common Law are violated by the Statute of Distributions. Its great object was equality. In Edwards v. Freeman, 2 P. Wms. 441, Sir J. Jekyl, M. R., says, "The Act intended to make the children's provision equal, which was agreeable to the Civil Law, where goods movable, and immovable, (i. e. lands,) are considered as the same." In the same case, Lord Raymond says, "The Statute of Distributions does not break into any settlement that has been made by the father; it only meddles with what is left undisposed

362 of by him, *and of that only, makes such a Will for the intestate, as a father, free from the partiality of affections, would himself make; and this I may call a Parliamentary Will. The intention of making the provisions of the children equal, goes through the whole Act." This Statute was incorporated into our Colonial Code in 1705, (3 H. St. L. 371;) continued in the Revision of 1748, (5 H. St. L. 444;) and remained in full force until the Laws of the Revision of 1785, went into effect. At the epoch of our Revolution, then, we had these two systems in operation. The Common Law Canons of Descent, founded on the Feudal System, disregarding natural affection and natural justice, and the Statute of Distributions, borrowed from the Civil Law, pursuing the presumed Will of the intestate, and well suited by its equality of partition, to the genius of our infant Government. Among the first cares of this Commonwealth, after the close of the war, was the framing of a body of Laws better suited to our actual situation, than those which had governed us, as part of a Monarchy. For this important work, were selected several citizens, considered most profoundly learned in the science of Law. Our Statute of Descents is a part of the fruits of their labors. It has hitherto been admired as a model of conscientiousness and perspicuity; and so well has it answered its end, that this (I think) is the first serious contest, which has arisen in a period of forty years, on a provision of the Law, which came from the hands of the Revisors. (The case of Brown v. Turberville, hereafter to be noticed, arose on an addition made by a subsequent Legislature.) Let us now look to the provisions of this Law. Section 1st. When any person, having title to any real estate of inheritance, shall die intestate, as to such estate, it shall descend and pass in parcenary to his kindred, male and female, in the following course. 2d. To his children, or their descendants, if there be. If none, then, 3d. To his father. 4th. To his mother, brothers and sisters, and the descendants, or such of them as there 363 be. If none of these, then, 5th. *The inheritance to be divided into two moieties; one of which shall go to the paternal, the other to the maternal kindred, in the following course. 6th. To the grandfather. If none, 7th. To the grand-mother, uncles and aunts, on the same side, and their descendants, or such of them as there be. 8th. If none, then to the great grand-fathers, or great grand-father, if there be but one. 9th. If none, then to the great grand-mothers, or great grand-mother, if but one; and the brothers and sisters of the grand-fathers and grand-mothers, and their descendants, or such of them as there be. And so on, in other cases without end. Section 16. "And where the children of the intestate, or his mother, brothers and sisters, or his grand-mother, uncles and aunts, or any of his female lineal ancestors living, with the children of his deceased lineal ancestors, male and female, in the same degree come into partition, they shall take per capita; that is to say, by persons; and where, a part of them being dead and a part living, the issue of those dead have right to partition, such issue shall take per stirpes, or by stocks; that is to say, the share of their deceased parent."

Let us enquire, 1st. Whether this Act did not intend to abolish, and has not in fact abolished, the whole of the Common Law regulating Descents? 2d. Whether our Act has not for its basis the Statute of Distributions and the Civil Law? As to the first: It seems to me, that no one can read our Statute, without being struck at once, with the direct and diametrical opposition, in which all its enactments stand to the Canons of the Common Law. The very first rule, "that estates shall descend and pass in parcenary to the kindred, male and female, of the intestate," destroys, at a single blow, there favorite and cherished principles of the Common Law; primogeniture, sole seisin, and the preference of males. In defect of children, and their descendants, we give the estate to the father. By the Common Law, it would sooner escheat, than ascend lineally.

We pay no respect to the blood of 364 the first "purchaser, (except in the case of infants, and that by a Law after 1785.) At Common Law, land would escheat sooner than descend to any however near of kin, if not of the blood of the first purchaser. We give collaterals of the half blood, half portions. The Common Law excludes them wholly. With us, bastards may inherit and transmit inheritance, on the part of the mother. At Common Law, they are utterly incapable of inheritance. We say, that where there is no kindred, paternal or maternal, the inheritance shall go to the wife or husband of the intestate. At Common Law, husband or wife can never inherit from each other. Do not these instances prove, that the framers of our Law, looked at the Common Law Canons of Descent to avoid, not to imitate? To pull down, not to build up? All its principles are violated: its land marks removed; its fences broken down; its traces obliterated. While these marks of reprobation would seem (even if our Act were confessedly defective,) to forbid our resorting to this exploded system to supply the defect, such resort is entirely unnecessary; for, I insist that our Act is a complete and perfect whole, containing within itself a provision for every case that can arise. As to the persons or classes of persons that are to inherit, it is acknowledged, that the Act is so clear and comprehensive, as to render improper a reference to any other system. And to my apprehension, it seems to be equally comprehensive as to the proportions, in which the persons or classes designated, are to take. As to this last, this Act lays down two rules; within one or other of which, every case must fall. They are contained in the first and sixteenth sections. 1st. The estate shall descend to the kindred, male and female of the intestate, in parcenary; that is, in equal shares. The clear effect of this is, that wherever a class is called to the inheritance together, they take equally, male and female. Thus, "to his children, or their descendants, in equal shares. To his mother, brothers and sisters, and their descendants, in equal 365 shares. To his "grand-mother, uncles and aunts, and their descendants, in equal shares;" and so on, in the grades more remote. Thus is one great principle of the Act (equality) established. But, there is another feature equally striking throughout this excellent Statute. It is founded on the affections of the heart: It follows the current in its natural flow, presuming that those that are nearest in blood, are nearest in affection. Thus, it is first to his children, or their descendants, next to his father, then to his mother, brothers and sisters, &c., always exhausting the nearer class before it passes to the more remote. But, in the same class, there are degrees of propinquity and remoteness; as the descendants of children, of brothers and sisters, of uncles and aunts, &c., are more remote than their roots. And while the Statute did not mean to exclude any of these remotes branches of a class called to the inheritance, the same principles of natural affection prescribed, that those of the class, who were nearest the intestate, should have the largest portions; and to effectuate this object, to settle these proportions among the different branches of the same class, (and solely for this end, as it seems to me,) the Statute has called to its aid the jus representationis, a rule common to the Civil and Common Law, though of different extent in the two Codes. Thus, (by section 16,) "When children of the intestate come into partition, they shall take per capita; that is to say, by persons; and where a part of them being dead and a part living, the issue of those dead have right to partition, such issue shall take per stirpes, or by stocks; that is to say, the share of their deceased parent." So of mothers, brothers and sisters, grand-mother, uncles and aunts, and the remoter classes, each in its turn. This is the second rule of which I spoke, and I understand it thus broadly: "That wherever several persons succeed to the inheritance at the same time, if they are all related to the intestate in equal degree, they shall take by persons; but, if part of them be more remote, those shall take the share of their deceased parent."

366 If "it be objected, that the words of the 16th section do not justify the deduction of a rule so general as this, but one restricted to the cases there mentioned, I answer, that the cases put are those quæ frequentius accidunt, that nothing is more common, than for Statutes to put such cases as examples of a general rule; it being impossible for the Law to enumerate every case, and that here we must give such extension to the rule, or violate the whole scheme and reason of the Statute. But take it, that the rule of the sixteenth section extends to those cases only which are there put, it by no means follows, that the Act is defective, and a resort to another system proper. No! The first rule comprehends and governs every case not within the second. If you say, that the jus representationis can only have place in the cases specially stated in the sixteenth section, then under the first, every person of a class that takes, must take per capita. It is a question between the different sections of the Act merely, and however decided the Law, taken as a whole, is equally complete and comprehensive, and equally abrogates the Common Law. And such was the decision in Brown v. Turberville, 2 Call, 390, which in my opinion is a strong case on the subject. It was suggested, that the question in that case was merely who should take, not in what proportions, and that every thing beyond this point was extra-judicial; but, that was clearly a mistake: the question was a much larger one. If the case was within the provisions of the Act of Descents, there could be no question who should take: the estate must have been divided into two moieties, and one would go the Plaintiffs, as representing the maternal line, the other to the Defendants, as nearest kindred of the paternal line. But the question was, whether the case was to be decided by the Statute, or the principles of the Common Law. The Legislature having omitted some words in the seventh section, which, if they could not be supplied, would operate, as was contended, a repeal of the Statute of 1785, as to the case at bar, and 367 the case being thus without the Statute, must be decided by the Common Law. The effect of the Statute of 1785, upon the Common Law, was thus brought directly before the Court. Judge Fleming says, "The Legislature conceiving that the Rule of Descents by the Common Law, was not well adapted to the genius of the people, and the form of our Government, totally changed it by the Act of 1785, which appears to have provided for every possible case." Judges Carrington and Lyons, though they do not express themselves so explicitly, seem to have had the same idea. But Mr. Pendleton, (who, it must be recollected, was one of the three who drew the Act of Descents,) could not be more clear and explicit than he is. He says, "To enquire from what source the force of the Common Law of England in this State, is derived, would at present be a useless speculation, since all agree that it is the general Law of the land, where it is not taken away by our Statutes. That the Act of 1785, has totally done away that Common Law, as to the course of Descents, has not been nor can be doubted. The rights of primogeniture are wholly abolished; and wherever there are more persons than one, of equal degree of kindred to the intestate, they share equally in the succession. The succession in the right line ascending, excluded by the Common Law, is here permitted. The objection to the half blood is removed, and the enquiry, through what blood the lands have descended to the intestate, is abolished. The intestate, is in all cases considered as the unrestrained proprietor; and his supposed preference, from natural affection, pursued under this Act, it must be acknowledged, that no possible case, not provided for, can arise, so as to let in the rule of the Common Law." Surely it cannot be said that this was an obiter opinion, that the mind of this enlightened Judge, was not turned to the subject, when he has stated with such admirable brevity and clearness, all the great principles of the Common Law, which the Statute has abolished. If (as is now 368 contended) the Statute of Descents *meant merely to point out the persons or classes who should succeed to the inheritance, and to designate in some enumerated cases, the proportions in which they should take, leaving all others, (and thousands may happen,) to be settled by the principles of the Common Law, is it not passing strange, that this Judge (so familiar with the subject,) should have solemnly pronounced "that the Act of 1785, has totally done away the Common Law as to the course of Descents," and that "under this Act, no possible case, not provided for, can happen, so as to let in the rule of the Common Law?" I cannot believe he could so grossly have mistaken the meaning and the effect of a Law, all the principles of which he had a hand in settling. Again: In Templeman v. Steptoe, 1 Munf. 339, Judge Tucker lays it down, "as too plain to require proof, that by the Act of 1785, all former Rules and Canons of Inheritance and succession to estates within this Commonwealth, whether established by Common Law, or by Statute, were rescinded, abrogated and annulled, and that they cannot be revived in any manner but by some express legislative provision for that purpose." In the same case, Judge Roane says, "The first section of the Act of Descents purports to provide a rule of inheritance as to all cases, and which idea is entirely supported by the opinion of this Court in Browne v. Turberville." I conclude, then, that by the Act of 1785, the Common Law of Descents is wholly abolished, and can no more be resorted to at this day to influence the decision of causes, than if it had never existed.

Let us enquire now into the origin of our Statute, whether it is not substantially taken from the Statute of Distributions and the Civil Law? I think this enquiry will strengthen considerably the position taken, that the sixteenth section meant to establish it as a general rule, that equals in degree of kindred take equally, but where part of the class is dead leaving issue, such issue take per stirpes. The most important provisions of our Statute of Distributions, (as taken from the Revision of 369 1748,) are, that after *debts, &c. are paid, the surplus of the personal estate (except slaves) of every person dying intestate, shall be distributed among the wife and children, or children's children, if any such, or otherwise, to the next of kin to the dead person in equal degree, or representing their stocks, according to their respective legal rights, and the rules and limitations herein-after expressed, and not otherwise: that is to say, one-third to the wife of the intestate, the residue to and among his children in equal proportions, and if any of them be dead, to such person or persons as legally represent them. If no children, nor their legal representatives, one half to the wife, the other to the next of kin who are in equal degree, and those who legally represent them; if no such kindred, the whole to the wife: no representation admitted among collaterals, after brothers' and sisters' children. There is also a provision taken from 1 Jac. 2, ch. 17, that if, after the death of the father, any child shall die intestate without wife or children, the brothers and sisters shall have his estate equally with the mother. This Statute, I have said, was taken from the Civil Law, and must be construed according to its rules. All the numerous cases upon the Statute lay this down. Thus, when the Statute says, that in defect of children the estate shall pass to the next of kin, we must look to the Civil Law to ascertain who they are. In Lloyd v. Tench, 2 Ves. sen. 213, Sir John Strange says, "some things are so clear they need only to be mentioned: as first, in all questions on the Statute of Distribution, the rule to go by, in computing the degrees of proximity of blood, must be taken from the Civil Law; and on this ground and foundation, stand all the cases which have come in Judgment since the Statute of Distribution, either at Law or in this Court." Who then, are the next of kin, when the descending line is exhausted? The father and mother. In England, the father of course, takes in exclusion of the mother, but if there were no father, the mother would have taken in exclusion of her children, but for the Stat. 1st Jac. 2, 370 under which, if the "father be dead, the mother, brothers and sisters, take per capita; and if any of the brothers or sisters be dead, leaving issue, such issue will take per stirpes, but here representation ceases: all beyond, come to the inheritance according to proximity of blood, reckoned by the rule of the Civil Law, the nearer excluding the more remote, and where several of the same grade concur, all taking per capita. Nor is the half blood any objection, for they are in the same degree of kindred as the whole. No one can examine this course of succession, without being struck with the strong and clear resemblance which our Law of Descents bears to it: and whoever will look into the Civil Law, especially to the 118th Novel of Justinian, (Corp. Jur. Civ. vol. 1st, 606, Cramer's Ed.) will be convinced that that is the fountain from which both these streams have flowed. But, though there is this strong general resemblance, there are several points in which our Statute has varied from its models. The most important of these is the jus representationis. This, we know, was at the Common Law, universal, whether in the descending or collateral line. In the Civil Law it held as to descendants in infinitum; as to ascendants, not at all; as to collaterals, it extended to the children of brothers and sisters of the intestate, no further. The Statute of Distribution has, certainly, copied the Civil Law with respect to representation among collaterals, stopping it at the children of brothers and sisters. Whether it has followed that Code as to the ascending line, is not so clear. Professor Cooper thinks not, as may be seen in his Notes on the 118th Novel, (Coop. Just'n. 394.) He puts this case: A. dies leaving grand-children by three different sons, already dead; three by one, six by another, and twelve by another. There is no reported adjudication in the English Books on this point, which I have been able to find; and Mr. Cooper states that he has seen none, but thinks it probable, that the Courts there, would in such a case, order the division to be made among the grand-children per capita; and this, partly from a motive of equity, and partly from a consideration of the intent of the Statute, which directs an equal and just distribution: and, when the Act mentions representation, it must be understood to refer to it, in those cases only, where it is necessary to prevent exclusion; not where all the claimants are in equal degree, and therefore can take each in his own right. I confess, there seems to me, a good deal of forcing this reasoning; but, as it is not necessary to the decision of this case, I have formed no opinion upon it. Our Statute, setting out with the broad declaration, that the state shall descend to the kindred, male and female, of the intestate in parcerary; and calling that kindred to the succession by classes, has resorted to the right of representation, for the sole and exclusive purpose of adjusting the proportions in which the nearer and more remote branches of each class shall share the inheritance; and so far as it is necessary for this purpose, the Statute has applied the principle without limit, as well to the collateral as the descending line. Another difference between our Statute and its prototype is, that when it takes up a class, it exhausts it, before it calls another; thus, it is not mother, brothers, and sisters, only; but, mother, brothers, and sisters, and their descendants, or such of them as there be, and so of the other grades; and this is by the extension of the jus representationis, which, embracing the whole class, brings the most remote members of it into the succession with the rest. Another difference is as to the half-blood; the Common Law excludes it wholly, the Statute of Distributions not at all; the Civil Law, if there be brothers and sisters of the whole blood or their children, excludes brothers and sisters of the half-blood, but if there be none of the whole, then the half-blood are called. Our Statute calls collaterals of the half-blood along with those of the whole, but gives them half portions only. These differences prove to me this, and nothing more: that the framers of our Law did not act as mere copyists; but, availed themselves of the lights which their profound learning, great experience, and sound judgment 372 furnished, to improve upon the systems from which they were borrowing, and adapt them more exactly to the state and condition of their country. Most ably did they perform this duty; and I trust that the Statute, as a monument of their skill, may be suffered to descend, undefaced, to late posterity; et nati natorum et qui nascentur ab illis.

There are other reasons which satisfy me, that the Statute of Descents meant to conform in the main points to the Act of Distributions. In the printed report of Prepared Bills, made by the Committee of Revisors to the General Assembly, at page 16, we find the "Bill directing the course of Descents," (marked in that report, chapter 20;) and on the same page commences the "Bill concerning Wills; the distribution of Intestates estates, &c," (marked in that report, chapter 21.) This last Law enacts, that after debts, &c., and the portion of the widow, the surplus of the personal estate of intestates, "shall be distributed in the same proportions, and to the same persons, as lands are directed to descend, in and by an Act of the General Assembly, entitled, "An Act directing the course of Descents." And these two Acts are passed together by the Legislature, at their October Session of 1785, making chapters 60, 61. 12 H. St. L. 138-40. This is a positive Declaration, that Descents and Distribution should be identical; that land and personality should pass to the same persons, and in the same proportions: Was it intended by this to change the course of Distribution, so just in itself, so exactly suited, by its spirit of equality, to our situation? Was it meant to place personal property under the guidance of the Common Law, with its feudal principles of preference and exclusion? A thing never done even in England, the personality there, being always regulated by the Civil Law, as administered in the Ecclesiastical Courts. It is impossible to believe this, and yet it must be so, unless we admit that the Statute of Descents meant to abolish all the principles of the Common Law in relation to this subject.

373 "Another piece of evidence has lately come to my knowledge, which, as tending to show the understanding of the Revisors, has strengthened and confirmed the opinion I had already formed; and which I think it not improper to state. Having some faint recollection, that in a conversation with Mr. Jefferson formerly, he had mentioned that he drew the Law of Descents, I thought there might be something among his papers casting light on its origin. I therefore wrote to a gentleman, who has access to his papers, requesting him to send me an extract of any thing he might find on that subject. I received from him the following passage taken from a memoir of himself, written by Mr. Jefferson, and which, I understand, will probably be published during the present year. I may, therefore, I presume, appeal to it as matter of history. It will be recollected, that of the committee of five appointed to make the Revision, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Wythe, and Mr. Pendleton, were the only members who acted, though the whole plan was settled before the death of Mr. Lee, or the resignation of Mr. Mason. The memoir says, "The other two gentlemen and myself divided the work among us. The Common Law and the Statutes to 4th James 1st, (when our separate Legislature was established,) was assigned to me; the British Statutes from that period to the present day, to Mr. Wythe, and the Virginia Laws to Mr. Pendleton. As the Law of Descents, and the Criminal Law, fell of course within my portion, I wished the committee to settle the leading principles of these as a guide for me in framing them; and with respect to the first, I proposed to abolish the Law of Primogeniture, and to make real estate descendible in part to the next of kin, as personal property is by the Statute of Distribution. Mr. Pendleton wished to preserve the right of primogeniture; but, seeing at once that that could not prevail he proposed we should adopt the Hebrew principle, and give a double portion to the eldest son. I observed, that if the eldest son could eat twice as much, or do double 374 "work, it might be a natural evidence of his right to a double portion; but, being on a par in his powers and wants, with his brothers and sisters, he should be on a par also in the partition of the patrimony; and such was the decision of the other members." I leave this extract to speak for itself. I will only further remark on this point, that I have no doubt that our Act was taken (with the changes stated) from the Statute of Distribution and the Civil Law.

How, then, would such a case as ours be decided under these systems? We must remember there are eleven claimants descended from a brother and sister of the intestate in the manner before stated. This is a case of collateral kindred called to the inheritance. We must recollect, that in the collateral line, representation extends only to the brothers' and sisters' children of the deceased, under the Statute of Distributions and the Civil Law, while with us it is unlimited. To test the principle, then, we must look for cases within the range of representation with them; that is, cases where brothers and sisters of the intestate concur, or where a part of them being dead, their children concur with the survivors; or where all the brothers and sisters being dead, leaving children in unequal numbers, those children concur. There can need no case to show, that where brothers and sisters concur alone, they take equally. Walsh v. Walsh, Pre. Che. 54. A. has three brothers; one dies, leaving three children, another two, and a third five; then A. dies intestate. Per Lord Keeper. On time taken to consider of this case, distribution shall be per capita and not per stirpes; and that all the children should have equal, because none take by way of representation, but all in equal degree, as next of kin. Johnson v. Bury, Bunb. Rep. 157. B. had several brothers and sisters, (some of the half, and some of the whole blood,) who all died in his life-time, leaving several children; and now, upon a Bill for distribution of his estate, it was decreed per totam curiam, that the distribution should be per capita, and not per stirpes; for, now 375 "they do not take by representation, but as next of kin. But, if one of the brothers or sisters of B. had survived him, the children of the rest must have taken only by representation; that is to say, per stirpes, and the case of Wall and Theedham, was cited by the Court. W. died intestate: He had two sisters, Susanna, of the half blood, Elizabeth, of the whole: Both died before him, one leaving one child, the other three. The estate was divided into four equal parts, and they took per capita. The case of Clarkson v. Sparteman, was also cited, in which the Judges Delegates decided, "That distribution should be per capita, and not per stirpes, all the old stock being gone; for, they claim as next of kin, and not by representation; aliter, if any of the old stock had survived." Lloyd v. Trench, 2 Ves. sen. 215, Sir John Strange says, "If there is one brother living, and another has left children, however many, they take but a moiety with the brother: but if that brother had been dead, all in the same line of equality take per capita." Bowers v. Littlewood, 1 P. Wms. 595, Lord Chancellor said, "It may seem hard, that if an intestate leave a deceased brother's only son, and ten children of a deceased half-sister, the ten children of the deceased half-sister shall take ten parts in eleven with the son of the deceased brother; and yet the Law is so, because they all take per capita, and not by way of representation." I will not cite, (though I could) more cases to this point. These are surely enough to show, that under the Statute of Distribution, it is a general rule, that equals in degree take equal portions, and that representation is only resorted to, to bring in one more remote; in which case, he takes per stirpes. The same rule holds in the Civil Law. Thus, Cujacius, vol. 2, 553, in his Exposition of the 118th Novel, says, "Succedunt quidem fratrum filii cum fratribus defuncti in stirpes, non in capita; quod si soli sint fratrum filii, succedunt in capita." Huberus also, vol. 1, 277, De successione ad intestato lays down the 376 same doctrine expressly "as settled.

Heineccius, in his Elementa Juris, p. 218, sec. 696, lays it down, that the sons of brothers, if they come alone to the inheritance, take per capita; if with their uncles, per stirpes. Domat also, in his Civil Law, vol. 1, 686, puts the case of brothers and brothers' children, and considers it established Law, that where the children concur with their uncles, they take per stirpes; when with one another, per capita. Thus we see, in both these systems, the foundation of the rule, established by the 16th section of our Act, that equals in degree take equally, while representation is used only to take in the more remote of the class, and to assign them the share of their parent; and the rule in our Law is only more extensive, because representation is unlimited; and when we call a class as next of kin, we embrace the remotest members of it, to all of whom, whether children, grand-children, or great grand-children of the class, the rule extends, equals, equally, unequals, per stirpes. Applying this rule to the case before us, I would divide the inheritance into as many parts, as there were members of the grade nearest the intestate, of which any survive, taking the survivors, and those who have died leaving issue. Thus, Anthony Gardner left a niece and two nephews living, and had had two other nieces, who died before him, leaving issue. I would, therefore, divide the estate into five equal parts, of which each living niece or nephew (I mean living at the death of A. G.) should have one, and the other two should go, one to the issue of Mrs. Boyd, the other to the issue of Mrs. Shackelford, to be divided among them according to the same rule. Those who contend that this is a case without the Statute, and to be decided by the principles of the Common Law, would place Mrs. Davis in the shoes of her father, and give her one half the estate, leaving the other half to go among the ten other kindred, two of whom are as near to the intestate as herself. It is never for a purpose of this kind that the Statute of Descents resorts to the jus representationis. There are several 377 *other proofs, (and strong ones too,) which have occurred to me as showing still further, that our Law draw its origin from the Civil Law; but, I pass them over, having already dwelt upon the subject too long. If I am wrong, it has not been for want of laborious investigation and anxious reflection on this important and interesting subject. Nor do I err alone, but in company with the fathers of the Law, the cotemporaneous exposition, and the general understanding of the country. I think the Decree ought to be affirmed.

JUDGE GREEN.

This case presents, for the first time, the question, whether the nephews and nieces, and grand-nephews, and grand-nieces of the intestate, succeeding together (his mother, brothers and sisters being dead,) shall, under our statute of Descents, take per capita, or in stirpes: and if in stirpes, whether the deceased brothers and sisters, or the living nephews, and nieces who have left children, shall be taken as the stocks.

It is admitted, that the Statute does not in terms provide for such a case. These questions must, therefore, be determined upon the best construction which we are enabled to make of the Statute itself, aided by a due attention to the Laws of Descents and Distribution, in force when it was enacted.

The Common Law of Descents looked for the heir of an intestate, first amongst his children or their descendants, if any there were. If there were none such, then amongst his brothers, and sisters, and their descendants, if any there were. If there were none such, then amongst his uncles and aunts, and their descendants, if any there were, and so on, without end, passing to the children, and their descendants, of the nearest ancestors of the intestate, any of whose descendants existed, excluding in all cases the ancestors themselves. Of all who could by possibility 378 succeed *to the inheritance, the children alone, (either of the intestate or his nearest ancestors, as the case might be,) could claim jure suo proprio; and when several such children succeeded together, they took per capita. All others, (to wit, the descendants of such children,) could only claim as representing such children, and as succeeding jure representationis, to what they would have been entitled to, if alive; and when several such descendants so succeeded together, they succeeded in stirpes by stocks: that is, each descendant represented his immediate parent, and took what he would have taken if alive, and no more. Thus, if there were grand-father, father and son, and the grand-father would, if living, be the heir of the intestate jure proprio, as being the child of one of his ancestors, and the grand-father, and father were dead before the intestate, the son could not claim as the immediate heir of the intestate, even if in his own person he was his nearest of kin, nor as immediately representing his grand-father, who, if alive, would have been heir, but as representing his own father, who, if alive, would have represented the grand-father. And so, the son would represent the grand-father through the medium of the father: and in such case, the descent would be mediate, and the grand-father and father would transmit the inheritance to the son. The consequence of this principle of representation was, that if any intermediate ancestor, who by possibility might have inherited, if alive, was disabled to inherit himself, by reason of his alienage, bastardy, or attainder, he could no longer transmit the inheritance to his descendants, since he would, if alive, have been incapable of taking it himself. Thus, in the case of the grand-father, father, and son before stated, in which the grand-father, if alive, would be heir to the intestate, if the father was disabled as aforesaid, the son would be barred of the inheritance; for, representing the father, who, if alive, could take nothing, he can take nothing. And so, if the grand-father was disabled, the son would be barred for representing the father, and entitled to take only what 379 he, if alive, could have *taken, and the father, if alive, representing the grand-father, and entitled only to take what he could have taken, if alive, and he being incapable of taking any thing by descent, the grand-son could take nothing, as thus mediately representing him. The disability, however, of an ancestor, common to the intestate, and his brother or other collateral heir, whether by alienage, bastardy, or attainder, was no impediment to a descent between them, because, the Law prohibiting the ancestor to succeed in any case to his own descendant, nothing could in any case be claimed, in respect to the inheritance, of any of its descendants, by any other of his descendants, as representing him; and the inheritance was consequently never transmitted through him: and therefore, a descent from brother to brother, was held to be an immediate descent. Another consequence of these principles of descent and representation, was, that no one could succeed, with his own ancestor living, to the inheritance; nor at all, if any of his ancestors was living, except in the case of a common ancestor, whose existence in full life was no impediment (for the reason aforesaid) to a descent between his descendants.

These general rules, which applied universally to all descents, even those of Gavelkind and Borough English, were directed in their application to each particular case, by various other rules, namely; the maxim paterna paternis, v. aterna maternis, which restored estates descended on the part of the father to the paternal, in utter exclusion of the maternal kindred, and vice versa; that in all descents to collaterals, the male lines throughout should be preferred to the female lines; that the half-blood should be wholly excluded; that males should be preferred to females, and amongst males the oldest; and that females should succeed together in parcenary. (a)

380 *In respect to the distribution of personal estates: before the Statute of Ed. 3, by the theory of the Law, the personal estates of intestates devolved upon the Ordinary, to be applied to pious uses. In practice, the Ordinary usually distributed them to the wife and children, and kindred of the intestate, according to the customary Law, (b) which agreed with the Civil Law, as it existed before the time of Justinian, by which, if there were no children, the father was preferred to all others, excluding the mother. (c) That statute directed that the Ordinary should depute the next and most loyal friends to administer. Under this Statute, the husband was considered as his wife's next and most loyal friend, and was preferred to all others; the wife and children as the next and most loyal friends of the husband, and next to them, the father. The Statute of Hen. 8, directed administration to be committed to the widow, or next of kin, allowing the Ordinary to elect between two or more in the same degree of relationship. Under these Statutes it was held, that the Administrator could not be compelled to make distribution; in consequence of which, the Statute of 22d and 23d Car. 2, ch. 10, directed distribution to be made equally to the children, (after payment of debts, and the provision for the widow,) or to such persons as legally represented them, if any were dead; and if there were no children, nor any legal representatives of them, then equally amongst the next of kin in equal degree, and their legal representatives, provided that no representation be admitted beyond brothers' and sisters' children. Under this Statute, although in case of a failure of descendants, the 381 next of kin in equal degree *were appointed to take, yet by virtue of an expression in another part of the Statute, directing distribution to be made "to the next of kin pro suo cuique jure according to the Law in such cases," the ancient preference given to the husband, was continued and sanctioned by a subsequent Statute, 29th Car. 2, ch. 3. And next to him, if there were no descendants, the father, who was preferred to the mother, though in equal degree; and the mother excluded brothers and sisters. (a) But this preference of the male to the female ancestor, was strictly confined to the case of father and mother. All other ancestors in the same degree, male and female, succeeded together. (b) And in respect to the preference of the mother to brothers and sisters, and their children, the Statute of James 2, provided, "that if after the death of the father, any of the children should die intestate, without wife or children, in the life-time of the mother, the brothers and sisters, and their representatives, should take equal shares with the mother." These Statutes were introduced into our Code in 1705, and continued in force when our Statute of Descents was enacted in 1785.

These Statutes, except in the preference given by them incidentally to the husband and father, in the manner already stated, conformed in their provisions, in the main, with the 118th and 127th Novels of Justinian, which called the father, mother, brothers and sisters together; and in all cases of doubt, the English Statutes were construed according to the Civil Law. (c)

Some views which have been taken of the case under consideration, make it desirable to understand the full effect of these Statutes of Distribution, and the principles on which they are founded. And first, what principle do they prescribe as to the succession of descendants? Do 382 *they, in all cases where any, or all of the children are dead leaving descendants, take in stirpes, all the descendants of each child respectively representing him, and taking the share which he would have taken if alive? Or, if all the children are dead leaving children in unequal numbers, do these grand-children succeed per capita, taking jure proprio as next of kin? And, if some of these grand-children are dead leaving children, do the latter take in stirpes, with the grand-children, living representing the deceased grand-children as their stocks?

It is remarkable, that these questions have never occurred in England in such a form as to make them the subject of a direct judicial determination; a circumstance which, I think, can only be accounted for by the supposition, that it has been universally considered there, as a question susceptible of no doubt, and that in all cases, descendants must take as children, or as representing them. This is the precise and literal effect of the terms of the Statute: "distribution shall be made equally to the children, or such persons as represent them, if any be dead," carefully avoiding any terms which might be construed to direct the distribution to be made to descendants in equal degree, and confining the claims of all descendants to children and such as represent them, that is, stand in the place, and entitle themselves to the rights, which the deceased children would have had if alive. This opinion is intimated by Chief Justice North, in Carter v. Crawley, T. Ray. Rep. 496, and plainly declared as his by Lord Hardwicke in Wythe v. Blackman, 1 Ves. sen. 196. And if there was any room for doubt upon the words of the Statute, an examination of the Civil Law upon this point, to which the Statute was intended to conform, and according to which it is construed in all doubtful cases, would remove it.

In the original frame of the Civil Law, as found in the 12 Tables, no representation was allowed in any case, either amongst descendants, or collaterals: The rule, that the nearest in degree excluded 383 the more remote, being inflexibly *enforced in all cases, and this by force of two very succinct Laws: the one "Intestatorum hereditates primo hæredum suorum, velint nolintve, sunt," by force of which, children excluded grand-children: (Vult. 374.) the other "deficientibus suis hæredibus proximus agnatus familiam habeto." (Id. 375.) This Law called the next agnate, only in case all the proper heirs (that is, descendants) failed: and the first of those heirs, that is, the nearest in degree, was preferred amongst them: so that, "Liberis primi gradus non existentibus, nepotes defuncti succedebant." (Id. 374.)

Before the time of Justinian, these Laws were variously modified, and representation amongst descendants allowed, but upon what principle, I do not find distinctly stated; but, no representation was ever allowed amongst collaterals, until Justinian allowed it, as a single exception to the general rule, in favor of brothers' and sisters' children concurring with father, mother, brothers or sisters living. By the 118th Novel he utterly abolished degrees amongst descendants, in terms, and declared, that "if any of the descendants of the deceased should die, leaving sons, or daughters, or other descendants, they shall succeed in place of their own father, and shall be entitled to the same share of the intestate's estate, which their father would have had, if he had lived;" which necessarily led up to the children as the stocks, to which representation was ultimately to be made. And there is no point in the Civil Law, in which all Civilians more unanimously agree, than in this construction of the Novel; (d) as Judge Cooper in his Justinian agrees, though at the same time he ventures an opinion, that the English Judges would determine otherwise. (e)

I think it is perfectly clear, that in the succession of descendants, the principle of representation has precisely the same effect in the Civil Law, the Statutes of Distributions, and the Common Law of Descents; that all descendants, *except children, (who alone can claim jure proprio, and take per capita,) must come into the succession, as representing their parents, through all their grades, no matter how many, up to the children of the intestate as the stocks according to which, partition or distribution is to be made.

As to the succession of ascendants and collaterals, the Statute of Distributions provides a general rule, in strict conformity with the original rule of the Civil Law, that distribution shall be made "amongst the next of kin in equal degree," in all cases, except that the father is still preferred, as he was by the Ancient Law, to the mother; and the brothers and sisters, and the children of such of them as are dead, succeed, with the mother, by force of the Statute of James 2d, the children representing the deceased brothers and sisters, and the children of brothers and sisters succeed with living brothers and sisters, the children representing their parents. In no other case, does the Statute allow of representation amongst collaterals, not even to the grand-children of brothers and sisters; (a) nor in any other case relaxes the rule, that the nearest in degree exclude the more remote. And in ascertaining the degrees, the Civil Law rule, quot personae, tot gradus, has been adopted, and never departed from, except in one single case, (where the brother has been allowed to exclude the grand-father, although in the same degree, upon the Common Law rule of computing degrees, by which brothers are in respect to each other in the first degree, and the descent between them, as before noticed, immediate;) (b) a decision obviously disapproved of in subsequent cases, in which it has been held, that grand-fathers and grand-mothers exclude, and great grand-fathers, and great grand-mothers, and uncles, and aunts, succeed with brothers' and sisters' children, where no mother, brother 385 or sister is "alive; that is, where they have not the benefit of the right of representation; (c) and no distinction was made between the whole and half-blood. (d)

In the only case in which representation is allowed amongst collaterals, that of brothers' and sister's children, where there is living a mother, brother or sister, it has been held, that if there be no mother, brother or sister living, they cannot take by representation to their parents, so as to vary the proportions amongst themselves, or to exclude others in the same degree, or to avoid being excluded by others in a nearer degree. Thus, in such case, they are excluded by grand-fathers and grand-mothers, and concur, and take equally per capita, with uncles and aunts, all of whom would be excluded, and the children of brothers and sisters take, if there were a mother, brother or sister alive (e)

These seemingly inconsistent consequences, arise out of the peculiar frame of the Laws which are alike in the Civil Law, and the Statute of Distributions. The general rule is, that the next of kin amongst collaterals, shall take equally, and exclude the more remote. To this general rule, there is one exception; that if there be a mother, brother or sister, the children of brothers and sisters may come into the distribution, as representing their deceased parents, and take the shares to which they would be entitled, if alive. If this precise case does not occur, (in which alone they are entitled to the benefit of the right of representation,) their case falls within the general rule; and if they are the next of kin, they take, as such, equal shares, excluding all others, as the grand-children of brothers and sisters; (f) or, if in equal degree with others, take 386 "equally with them per capita; or are excluded by such as are nearer of kin as aforesaid.

Here let us notice the circumstances in which the Statute of Distributions, and the Common Law of Descents, so far as the principle of representation operates in the succession of collaterals, agree, and in what they differ. In the only case in which the Statute of Distributions admits of representation amongst collaterals, they agree precisely. The representation is made in that case to the children of the nearest ancestors of the intestate, as in the case of descents. In all other cases, by force of the Common Law, principle of representation in descents, the descendants, however remote in degree, of the nearest ancestors of the intestate, representing the children of such nearest ancestors, exclude the descendants, however near in degree, of more remote ancestors. But, the Statute of Distributions calls together the descendants of ancestors in different degrees, provided those descendants are in their own persons in equal degree; and the descendants of ancestors in a more remote degree, who are themselves nearer in degree, exclude those of ancestors in a nearer degree, who are themselves in a more remote degree. Thus, suppose a grand-son of a brother, the son of an uncle, and a great uncle. By the Common Law of Descents, the grand-son of the brother would exclude all the rest, but under the Statute of Distributions, all would succeed per capita together, or if there were an uncle, he would exclude the grand-son of a brother: the latter of whom would exclude the former under the principles of the Common Law of Descents. In short, so far as the principles of representation was concerned, the Common Law of Descents applied the same rule to the succession of collaterals, as to that of descendants, preferring him who was nearest in degree by representation, no matter how remote, in his proper person, in all cases, to him even if nearer degree, in his proper person, whose common ancestors was more remote than the common ancestor of the person preferred: whilst the Statute of Distributions preferred 387 all (except in "one particular case) according to their degrees of propinquity in their proper persons, without regard to the degree of the propinquity of the common ancestor.

Such were the principles of our Laws of Descent and Distribution, when our Statute of Descents was enacted; bearing these in mind, let us proceed to examine its provisions.

It directs that the estate of an intestate, "shall descend, and pass in parcenary to his kindred, male and female, in the following course: To his children, or their descendants, if any there be. If there be no children, nor their descendants, then to his father. If there be no father, then to his mother, brother and sisters, and their descendants, or such of them as there be. If there be no mother, brother, nor sister, nor their descendants, then the inheritance shall be divided into two moieties, one of which shall go to the paternal, the other to the maternal kindred, in the following course: That is to say; first, to the grand-father. If there be no grand-father, then to the grand-mother, uncles, and aunts on the same side, and their descendants, or such of them as there be. If there be no grand-mother, uncle, nor aunt, then to the great grand-fathers, or great grand-father, if there be but one. If there be no great grand-father, then to the great grand-mothers, or great grand-mother, if there be but one, and the brothers and sisters of the grand-fathers, and grand-mothers, and their descendants, or such of them as there be. Sec. 10. And so on, in other cases, without end, passing to the nearest lineal male ancestors, and for the want of them, to the lineal female ancestors, in the same degree, and the descendants of such male and female lineal ancestors, or to such of them as there be." The 11th, 12th, and 13th sections provide, that no person other than children of the intestate shall inherit, unless in esse, and capable in Law to take as heirs, at the time of the intestate's death; that if there be no maternal kindred, the whole shall go to the paternal and vice versa: and if no kindred, to the wife or *husband, or to their kindred: and that the half-blood shall take half portions, and if all be of the half-blood, the ascendants (if any) shall have double portions. Then comes the 14th section, (the 16th in our present Statute,) which provides, "And when the children of the intestate, or his mother, brothers and sisters, or his grand-mother, uncles and aunts, or any of his lineal female ancestors living, with the children of his deceased lineal ancestors, male and female, in the same degree, come into the partition, they shall take per capita; that is to say, by persons; and when a part of them being dead, and a part living, the issue of those dead have right to partition, such issue shall take per stirpes, or by stocks; that is to say, the share of their deceased parent."

These are all the provisions of the Statute, which designate the persons to take, and proportions in which they are to take. None of these extends in terms to the case at bar, for here is no child, nor mother, brother, sister, grand-mother, uncle, aunt, or female ancestor, or child of a deceased male or female ancestor, to come into the partition; in which cases only, does the Statute prescribe the mode of distribution; and the same rule which is applicable to this case of nephews and great nephews, (no mother, brother or sister being alive,) will apply to grand-children and great grand-children, (no child being alive,) and to all cases in which a female ancestor (beyond a grand-mother,) living, and her children, or their descendants, of the half-blood come into the partition, all of which are equally unprovided for by the terms of the Statute. There is extreme, and indeed insurmountable difficulty, in deducing any general rule from the terms of the Statute itself, by which to determine these pretermitted cases, without supposing that some principle of the pre-existing Laws of Descent or Distribution, modified by the Statute, still remained in force, and provided for them. The provisions of the Statute designating the persons to take, would, in all such cases, entitle all who were so designated, to take *equal shares, unless there were something in the Statute itself, which, upon a just construction, would afford a different rule, or unless some such extraneous rule controuled this construction. This rule, that all who are designated to take, shall take equally, unless some other rule is prescribed, is dictated by common sense, is the settled and clear rule in the construction of Deeds and Wills, (a) and the rule of the Civil Law in the construction of the Laws regulating the succession to intestates' estates. (b) If the Authors of our Statute had intended to prescribe a new general rule, by which to ascertain in what case the heirs should take per capita, and in what per stirpes, and by which to determine who should be the stocks in all cases, without any regard to the Common Law principles of descent, or the former Statute of Distribution, and wholly independent of, and differing from, them both, nothing would have been easier than to announce such rule in the most concise terms, by declaring that where the children of the intestate, or any of his living female ancestors, and the children of his ancestors, male and female, in the same degree, came alone into the partition, they should take per capita; and if any or all of them were dead, their descendants coming into the partition, should take per stirpes, considering them as the stocks by which to make the partition; or, that when several in equal degree came into the partition alone, they should take per capita, but any in a more remote degree, coming into the partition with them, those should take per stirpes, as representing ultimately their ancestors, who, if alive, would have taken per capita, with those living, and in the nearest degree to the intestate. They surely never could have dreamed of establishing a general rule, by giving an example, from which it is impossible to deduce any such rule. For instance, if we suppose they intended to establish the 390 general *rule, that the children of the intestate, or his female ancestors living, and the children of all his ancestors, male and female, in the same degree, should be the only persons entitled to take per capita in their own right, and that their descendants should in all cases claim as representing them, the example is imperfect, since it does not embrace the children of a living female ancestor, who, if of the half-blood, would not be the children of any deceased ancestor of the intestate. Nor does it serve better as an example of a case in which those in equal degree are to take per capita, merely because they are in equal degree, and all others in more remote degrees, in stirpes, as representing their ancestors, who, if alive, would be in the same degree; for, in the example, the persons directed to take per capita, may be in unequal degrees; as the female ancestor living, and the children of deceased ancestors in the same degree. The framers of the Statute must, therefore, have thought it unnecessary to prescribe any general rule upon this subject, because in the former Laws which they were engaged in re-forming, not in abrogating, there was a principle, not inconsistent with any of the provisions of the Statute, and therefore, not impaired, or abrogated, which would provide for all cases not specially provided for by the 14th section; and must have inserted the provisions of this section for some distinct purpose unconnected with the establishment of a general rule of partition, a purpose which I think I shall be able to point out distinctly. This principle of the former Laws, which remained in full force, was the Common Law principle of representation in descents, which alone, of all the principles of the Laws of Descent and Distribution then in force, could operate universally, both in lineal and collateral descents; and by providing for all possible cases, make it superfluous to prescribe any other general rule. For, by the Statute of Distributions, representation was only allowed in two cases; those of descendants, and of the children of brothers and sisters only, and the last only in a particular and excepted case; *in both of 391 which, it conformed strictly to the Common Law principle of representation, referring the representation to the children of the intestate in one case, and to the children of his nearest ancestors in the other, as the stocks beyond whom there could be no further representation. In all other cases, the principles of the Statute of Distributions, if remaining in force, would have allowed of no representation, and left, in all other cases not specially provided for by the Statute, all the persons designated, as entitled to come into the partition, to take equal shares, according to the literal effect of the clauses so designating them to take.

Notwithstanding the repeated extra-judicial suggestions, that our Statute intended to abrogate the Common Law of Descents in toto, I am persuaded that, in this, as in all other cases, the object of our Legislature was to reform what was obnoxious to natural equity, and the spirit of our institutions in the Common Law, leaving such parts of it as was not liable to those objections, in full force, and not to abrogate it entirely, and establish a new system, as if no such thing as the descent of the estates of intestates to their heirs had ever been heard of in Virginia. There are many proofs in the provisions of the Statute itself, to show that not only the Common Law principle of representation, but many other principles of the Common Law of Descents were considered as in full force, except so far as they were modified by provisions of the Statute, introduced for the purpose of so modifying, and not of abrogating them in toto. Some of the principles of the Common Law of Descents, to wit, that of paterna paternis, materna maternis, and the preference of male to female lines amongst collaterals, and of males to females, and of the eldest amongst males, and the exclusion of ancestors and the half-blood, were founded on Feudal Principles, the policy of which was to preserve estates entire or contrary to natural equity, and being inconsistent with the spirit of our institutions, were effectually abolished.

But the Common Law principle 392 *of representation was founded on the broad principles of natural equity, and in no degree inconsistent with the policy of our institutions, since it has no tendency to preserve estates entire, and therefore was admitted in all cases in the Common Law of Descents. Nor can I feel the force of Judge Blackstone's remark, that this mode of representation was a necessary consequence of the double preference of the males to females, and of the eldest, amongst the males; for, it existed in the Civil Law in the case of descendants, where there was no such preference, and also in the Common Law, whilst it allowed no such preference, and admitted all males and females alike, (a) and now prevails in respect to Gavelkind lands in England, to which all the male issue succeed together, and in parcenary. (Clements v. Scudamore, 1 P. Wms. 63; Littleton, sec. 265.) This principle is so familiar with us, that it is almost received as a Law of Nature, that children stand in the place of their parents, and take what they would have taken, if alive. And this was the opinion of the Civilians.

Vultei, (or Vultijus) stating the case of all the grand-children succeeding in stirpes, as representing the children, says, "Nam quod succedunt avo suo, id fit occasione parentum suorum, et ut ita dicam, medio et beneficio ipsorum." (p. 379,) and noticing the introduction of this right of representation, which was unknown to the Ancient Law, and citing Ulpian, he says, "Ex quo apparet jus representationis non veritate ipsa, sed fictione, niti quæ tamen fictio fundata sit in naturali æquitate." (p. 378.) This principle of natural equity was violated by the Laws of the 12 Tables, in order to preserve estates entire. This policy, however, in after times, yielded to the sense of justice, in favor of descendants, and brothers' and sisters' children only, both in the Civil Law, and the English Law of Distributions. Whilst in the Common Law of Descents, full effect was allowed to the operation of this principle of natural *equity, since it had no tendency to frustrate the policy of preserving estates entire, that object being most effectually secured by the sole succession of the eldest male, and the preference of male to female lines. It was upon this principle of natural equity, too, that the Common Law of Descents, instead of selecting, amongst collaterals, the kinsman of the intestate nearest in degree to him without regard to the degree of their common ancestor, according to the Civil Law and the Statute of Distributions, preferred the more remote kinsman descended from the child of the nearest common ancestor, as representing and standing in the place of that child, to a nearer kinsman, the child or other descendant of a more remote ancestor, and in this particular, our Statute pursues the principles of the Common Law, and repudiates those of the Civil Law, and Statute of Distributions. It also explicitly approves of, and adopts the Common Law principle of representation, in selecting the classes who are preferred to the inheritance. In this, it is in precise conformity to the Common Law, inasmuch that many cases might occur, in which, under our Statute, and the Common Law, all the persons who would succeed under the one, would also succeed under the other, as in every case where the principles of paterna paternis, the preference of male to female lines, and of males to females, and of eldest male, and the exclusion of ascendants and the half-blood, had no effect. Thus, if all were female descendants of the intestate, and descendants through females, all would succeed together, and take in parcenary alike, both by the Common Law and our Statute. And so of collaterals: if all the common ancestors were dead, and the estate was purchased by the intestate, and his only relations were female descendants, through females from his sisters, or aunts, or great aunts, on the part of his father, and of the whole blood, the same persons would inherit under both systems of Laws. If such a Statute as ours were enacted in England, all those principles which would otherwise prevent such a descent in any *case being thereby abolished, the same persons would take there, as here, under our Statute in all cases. And no one surely can doubt, but that such a Statute passed in England, would there leave the Common Law principle of representation untouched, then why not here: the Common Law, except so far as it is modified by our Statutes, or the circumstances of our country, being as much our Law, as the Law of England. This preference of classes of relations, bottomed upon the Common Law principle of representation alone, in which our Statute concurs with the Common Laws of Descents, is, I think, a persuasive proof, that that principle was approved of, and intended to be adopted, or rather left untouched by the Authors of our Statute.

There are other provisions in this Statute, and in others enacted very shortly after it, which, I think, decisively prove that this principle was considered as unimpaired by our Statute. We have seen, that the bar to all his descendants, created by the disability of an intermediate ancestor, through whom the inheritance must be transmitted to them, was founded solely upon this principle of unlimited representation. In the Civil Law, where the next of kin took jure proprio as such, a child who would be next of kin, if his father was dead, would take as such, although his father was alive, if his father was disabled to take by alienage, or was condemned for a crime which disabled him. 1 Domat, 583. The Authors of our Statute inserted in it a provision, "that in making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a demandant, that any ancestor through whom he derives his descent, from the intestate, is, or hath been, an alien. Bastards, also, shall be capable of inheriting, and transmitting inheritance on the part of their mother, in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of such mother." Provisions utterly superfluous, but upon the supposition that the Common Law rule of representation was in force, and every descendant of a child of the intestate, or of a child of an ancestor of the intestate, could only succeed as representing all his ancestors, intermediate *between him and the intestate. This provision, whilst it took away the disability of alienage in lineal, left it untouched in collateral descents, as it now remains, and the disability arising from the attainer of an intermediate ancestor, was not taken away until 1789. (a)

It is to these cases, and one other which will presently be mentioned, that the expression in the 14th section refers: "where the issue of those dead have a right to partition;" supposing that in some cases they might not have such right.

The provision in the Statute modifying the disability of alienage, is very remarkable. It not only took away the impediment at Common Law, to the descent to the issue of an alien, by reason of his disability in the case of a lineal descent, in case such an intermediate alien ancestor was dead, but even if he were alive. This is the clear effect of the expression, "is, or hath been an alien;" thus making, in this single instance, an exception to the principle of the Common Law of Descents, that the issue of an intermediate ancestor alive, who might by possibility have been capable of inheriting, could never inherit in the life-time of such ancestor, whether he were disabled by alienage, or otherwise, or not; and in this, conforming to the principle of the Civil Law, as before stated.

Another provision, affording an additional proof to the same effect, is that respecting advancements to be brought into hotchpot. "And when any of the children of the intestate, or their issue, shall have received from the intestate in his life-time any real estate by way of advancement, and shall choose to come into the partition with the other parceners, such advancement shall be brought into hotchpot with the estate descended." The Statute of Distributions only required advancements made to the children of the intestate, and not such as were made to the issue of such children;(a) and the Common Law 396 only required "lands given in frank-marriage, to be brought into hotchpot. This more enlarged provision on the subject of advancements, which was intended to provide a more equitable and equal distribution of estates than had been provided by the Statute of Distributions, or the Common Law, in cases of parceners, was founded on the admission, that the Common Law principle of representation was still in force, without which it might produce the most flagrant injustice. If grandchildren, all the children being dead, could succeed per capita, jure proprio, without representing and standing in the place of their parents, (the deceased children,) and bound to take the shares only, which they would have taken if alive, then, if a man had two sons, and advanced one to the amount of half of his estate, and the one advanced died in his father's life-time, leaving four children, and the other child died in his father's life-time, leaving one child, and then the father died intestate, these five grand-children taking, jure proprio, per capita, the children of the advanced child would be entitled to claim four-fifths of the estate, without accounting for the advancement made to their father, and thus would virtually get nine-tenths of the estate, leaving only one-tenth for the only child of the unadvanced child of the intestate. It is impossible, that the Authors of our Statute should have contemplated that such consequences could arise from the accidental circumstance of both the children of the intestate dying in his life-time. In Knight v. Yarborough, Gilin. 27, which was a case relating to the execution of a power of appointment, to which the Court obviously applied the principles of this Statute, and I think, gave it the just construction, it was held, that appointments in the nature of advancements made to a grand-child, after his parents' death, should not only be brought into the division of the unappropriated residue, and considered as a part of his proportion in the division of his father's share between his children, but also as a part of his father's share in the grand-father's estate, and this last, whether the grand-child chose to come into the partition, or 397 not. If "the grand-child so represents his father, that advancements made to him, go to diminish his father's share in respect to his other children, surely advancements to the intestate's son must go to diminish the shares of his children under all possible circumstances. But, they would not have that effect, unless his children represented him under all possible circumstances.

Another provision of the Statute also shows, that the Common Law principles of descents were considered as still in force, except so far as they were inconsistent with the provisions of the Statute. By the Common Law of Descents, if the eldest son died, in the life-time of his father, leaving his wife enseat of a child, and then the father died, and a younger son entered, as he had a right to do as heir, and afterwards the child of the eldest son was born, this child was the heir of the father, and displaced the title of the younger son, and so, of an elder and younger brother of the intestate, or any other collaterals.(b) The Statute provides, that "No right of inheritance shall accrue to any person whatever, other than to children of the intestate, unless they be in being, and capable in Law to take as heirs (the parent not being disabled) at the time of the intestate's death:" thus modifying, not abrogating, an acknowledged principle of the Common Law of Descents.

It seems to me, therefore, that the scheme of the Revisors, who prepared this Statute, was to modify the Common Law of Descents by abrogating all of its obnoxious principles, and modifying others, so as to adapt them to the general policy of our Laws, leaving those not abolished, to operate 398 "in full force, where not modified, and when modified, in their modified form. Accordingly, they abolished the rule paterna paternis, materna maternis; the preference of male to female lines, and of males to females, and of the eldest male, and admitted ascendants and the half-blood, partially. They adopted the Common Law principle of representation explicitly, in its most important effect, in the designation of the order in which classes of kindred should succeed, leaving it to operate as at the Common Law in all cases, with a limitation upon it, in a single case imposed by the Statute, which I shall presently advert to: they modified the Common Law principles as to the succession of posthumous children the impediments to a descent by the disability of an intermediate ancestor, and in respect to advancements; and they left untouched the Common Law principle in relation to descents in parcenary, which allowed to the eldest parcener, and in some cases to her representative, the choice of the lots in the partition,(c) a privilege shortly after abolished by Statute. (Oct. 1790, ch. 13, § 6, and 13 Hen. St. Lar. 122.)

Considering the Common Law principle of representation as not being abrogated, it might, at the first blush, seem to have been unnecessary to insert in the statute any provision in relation to the cases in which the persons coming into the partition, should take per capita, or per stirpes, and it is necessary to enquire for what purposes the provisions of the 14th section were introduced.

(b) Coke Litt 11. b. If a man has issue, a son and a daughter, and the son purchase lands, and dies without issue, the daughter shall inherit the land; but, if the father has issue afterwards, (no matter how long after,) a son, this son shall enter into the land, as heir of his brother, and if he has issue, a daughter, and no son, she shall be a co-parcener with her sister.

Without considering the Common Law, in force in this respect, this could not have happened under our Statute, which only designates brothers and sisters, and their descendants, or such of them as there be at the death of the intestate.—Note in Original Edition.

to the inheritance, and preferred males to females in this instance only, and having directed that female ancestors should succeed with the descendants of all ancestors in the same degree with her, including those of the living female ancestors coming into the partition, the consequence would have been, (if not guarded against by the Statute,) that by force of the Common Law principle of representation still 399 in full force, and *which requires representation in all cases to be made to the most remote ancestor of the claimant, who, if alive, might have inherited jure proprio, the children of the deceased ancestors of the intestate, who, if alive, would have inherited jure proprio, (especially of deceased female ancestors,) might have claimed not only the shares which they are entitled to take, jure proprio, but also the share which their deceased parent, the common ancestor, would have taken, if alive. Thus, if a woman had two children by a former, and one by a present husband, and one of the two died intestate, his surviving brother of the whole blood, and his mother, each being entitled to double portions, would take two-fifths each, and the brother of the half-blood the remaining one-fifth; but if the mother were to die first, and then one of the two first children died intestate, the question would arise, whether, as before, the brother of the whole blood should take two-fifths in his own right, and one-fifth in right of his mother, whom he with his brother represented equally, and who, if alive, would have taken two-fifths, and the brother of the half-blood one-fifth, in his own right as before, and one-fifth in right of his mother; or whether, taking altogether in their own right, the brother of the whole blood should take two-thirds, and he of the half-blood one-third. And I do not see how the claim to represent the deceased mother could be resisted. It would, at least, have been a serious question: and such questions might be multiplied amongst the descendants of remote ancestors who were of the whole blood. To obviate these consequences, was I think, the chief object of the 14th section, and this was completely effected by the declaration, that female ancestors, and the children of deceased ancestors, male and female, in the same degree, (a general description which embraces the particular cases of mother, brothers and sisters, grand-mother, uncles and aunts, provided for in the same clause,) should take per capita, that is, only in their own right, and not as representing a deceased common ancestor.

This also precluded the descendants 400 *of such children from claiming to represent any common ancestor; for, they claiming through all their ancestors in succession, as representing them immediately or mediately, when the representation reached the children of the deceased common ancestor, it must have stopped there, since these children were prohibited to claim any thing as representing any other. Thus the rule of representation, which would otherwise have been extended to the common ancestors as the stocks, at least in some cases, was, by this provision, effectually limited in its practical operation, according to its effect at the Common Law, making the children of the common ancestors the stocks, in which the representation terminated in all cases.

There is in the terms of this section itself, an internal, and I think, conclusive proof, that the purpose which I attribute to it was the only object of that provision, so far as it directed the female ancestor living, and the children of deceased ancestors, male and female, in the same degree, to take per capita. This omits the case of the children of a living female ancestor coming into the partition with her alone, or with her and the children of deceased ancestors in the same degree. If that provision had any conceivable object, other than that which I attribute to it, there was precisely the same reason for embracing the children of living, as of deceased ancestors, in the same degree, since they were related to the intestate in the same degree and manner, to all intents and purposes. If it was intended to prescribe a rule of partition for a particular case, or a general rule, by putting an example, to be applied to all analogous cases, upon the supposition, that no rule existed, independent of the Statute, in either case there was an absolute necessity, in order to avoid absurdity and confusion, to embrace the children of living, as well as of deceased ancestors, in the same degree, in that provision. This distinction between the children of living and deceased ancestors, was made designedly and ex industria. The Authors of the Statute, collecting all the 401 *cases in which several might succeed together, and selecting from them particular persons, specify, in the very terms of the 2d, 4th and 7th sections, the cases of children, mother, brothers, sisters, and grand-mothers, uncles and aunts, and passing the 9th, (which designated the brothers and sisters of grand-fathers and grand-mothers,) because it fell within the general terms of the 10th section, adopt the language of the 10th, (which embraced all the former cases in its general terms, and embraced also the descendants of all ancestors in the same degree, living and dead,) with this exception, that the provision of the 14th section, whilst it embraces the children of the deceased, excludes those of the living female ancestors: which could not have been done without a motive, for otherwise it was natural, that they should have adopted the terms of the 10th section literally, as they did those of the 2d, 4th, and 7th, and embraced in the provisions of the 14th section the children of living, as well as of deceased ancestors. The weight of this observation is not implied by the circumstance, that the designation of brothers and sisters, and uncles and aunts, by those names, in fact embraced all the children of living, as well as of deceased fathers, mothers, grand-fathers and grand-mothers. The omission of the children of living female ancestors, and including in terms the children of deceased ancestors, in the more general description of the persons intended to be embraced in the 14th section, is a clear proof that, although all brothers and sisters, and uncles and aunts, (the children of living, as well as of deceased ancestors,) were embraced in the terms of that section, none of them but such as were the children of deceased ancestors of the intestate, fell within the reason and objects of the provisions of the 14th section; and that to effect that object, whatever it was, it was not necessary to include the children of living ancestors. At the same time the fact, that in one part of this provision, the children of living, as well as of deceased ancestors, are included, and in another, those of living 402 ancestors are excluded, *is a decisive proof, that it was immaterial to the object of that provision, whether the children of living ancestors were excluded, or included, whilst to include the children of deceased ancestors, was indispensably necessary to the attainment of that object. This was precisely the character of the object which I attribute to that provision, and which cannot be attributed to any other conceivable object whatever.

If the children of all ancestors in the same degree, living and dead, were included in this provision, then, by force of this provision alone a representation to a common ancestor would be prohibited in all cases, without any reference to any principle of the Common Law. If the children of a living ancestor were excluded from the terms of this provision, then the Statute would prohibit a representation to a deceased common ancestor only; and in that case, the principles of the Common Law of descents would prohibit a representation to the living ancestors, since no one can represent and take the share of any one who is alive and can take it herself. This view of the provisions of the 14th section cannot be avoided by the supposition, that in no case could a child of a common ancestor come into the partition unless at least one of the common ancestors (the male) were dead. If a woman had two children by a first, and one by a second husband, and one of the two were to die intestate, the surviving brother of the whole blood, the mother and the brother of the half-blood would succeed, although the latter would not be a child of any deceased ancestor of the intestate: and although this particular case is embraced in the terms of the 14th section, yet cases might occur in which not one of those succeeding, would be the children of any deceased ancestor of the intestate, as if the only relations of the intestate were a great grand-mother, and her children, and other descendants, all of them of the half-blood; a case totally unprovided for by this section. The word deceased being introduced for no other conceivable purpose, but to prohibit any 403 claim by *representation to a deceased common ancestor, and it not being necessary to introduce that word for that purpose, it could only be introduced because that object, occupying the mind of the Author of the Statute, he naturally expressed it distinctly, by using the word appropriate to that object; or he inserted it purposely to afford an infallible clue to the true object of that provision: and this, I am strongly disposed to think, was the true reason for the use of that word.

I confess, that the necessity which I felt to ascertain the true object of inserting this word, as well as of every other word in the Statute, led me to a course of reflection, which has changed my first opinion; for, following blindly, and without examination, the incautious and extra-judicial suggestion so often made, that our ancestors, in their extreme hostility to the Common Law of Descents, had abolished it in all its parts, root and branch, I at first thought, that the Statute not having provided in all cases for the proportions in which estates should descend, in such as were not provided for, all who came into the partition, were entitled to take equal shares, according to the rule in the construction of Deeds and Wills, and the Civil Law rule applied to the very case of the Laws regulating the succession to intestates' estates. And this would certainly be the case, unless that construction was controuled by some pre-existing principle of the Common Law of Descents, or some provision of the Statute, or by both combined, the latter of which will, I think, be found to be the fact.

If the sole object of the 14th section had been that of prohibiting any claim by representation to a deceased common ancestor, that would have been fully effected by the declaration, that the children of the deceased ancestors of the intestate, and a living female ancestor, coming into the partition, should take per capita; that is, upon the supposition, that the Common Law principle of representation was in full force, since that would have supplied the rule, in case some of them were dead, 404 and some were living, or *all dead; and that, precisely to the same effect as the rule prescribed by the Statute in particular cases. And if that object had been the only one, that part of the section which embraces the children of the intestate, and provides that if a part of those designated to take per capita be dead, and a part of them living, the issue of those dead should take per stirpes, would have been superfluous, and we are necessarily led to enquire, for what purpose those provisions were inserted: For the purpose, I think, and for that only, of prohibiting a construction of the clauses of the Statute designating the classes of persons to take (which we may term the donative clauses,) by which, all coming within the literal terms of those clauses, might be considered as entitled to take equal shares, and even children to take with their living parents; for the children of a living son or brother, are no less his descendants when he is alive, than after he is dead. The principle of the Common Law of Descents prohibited any one, whose intermediate ancestor (other than the common ancestor) was alive, from succeeding to an estate, or to claim otherwise than by representation, where any intermediate ancestor could by possibility have been capable of taking the inheritance if alive, (our Statute making one single exception even to that rule.) The literal terms of the Statute calling children and their descendants, brothers and sisters and their descendants, &c. to the succession, without distinction, might have been considered as abrogating these principles of the Common Law, unless there were some provision in the Statute opposed to such a construction, and showing that these Common Law principles were in full force. To give a single example of a succession by representation in stirpes, in conformity with the principles of the Common Law, was sufficient for that purpose, and it was convenient to annex it to the provision declaring who should take per capita, which was accordingly done, and the example given is precisely in conformity with the effect of the Common Law principle of representation, making the children of the intestate, "or the children of his nearest ancestors, the stirpes, or stocks."

Here I think I might, and perhaps ought to cease, but the opinion of Judge Tucker, to which it is said the public opinion and practice have conformed, (although I have never heard of any case having actually occurred, except this,) has been so much urged as proper to govern our decision, that it may not be amiss to examine it. He lays it down as a general rule, as to which he does not seem to have imagined there could be any doubt, that "where several persons succeed at the same time in equal degree, they shall take per capita, but if a part be more remote than others, those more remote shall succeed in stirpes." And he puts the case of six grand-children, by different deceased children in unequal numbers, and says they would take per capita; and this he says, is in conformity to the Civil Law. And in a note to Blackstone's Commentaries, where the author states the case in the Civil Law, of nephews and nieces succeeding alone, and taking per capita, or if with brothers and sisters in stirpes, he states, that this is in conformity with the rule established by our Statute, and cites the terms of the 14th section verbatim, without comment, as if it clearly established that rule in terms. He nowhere assigns any reason for this construction, as he certainly would have done, if the question, as now presented, had occurred to his mind. It seems to me, that having satisfied himself that our Statute intended to abolish the Common Law of Descents in omnibus, which he labors to prove, by pointing out the many discrepancies between our Statute and the Common Law; and believing that the Civil Law rule was such as he states ours to be, both in lineal and collateral successions, an impression readily enough taken from the careless manner in which Blackstone states the rule of the Civil Law in both respects; and considering the words "children of his deceased ancestors," in the 14th section, as meaning all their descendants, as it sometimes does, both in the Civil and Common Law, and the words "male and female, in the same degree," as referring to those who came into the inheritance, (an impression very natural to one whose attention was not particularly excited to the examination of those phrases,) Judge Tucker, hastily and without perceiving that any question could be raised upon the subject, concluded, that the Legislature intended to substitute the Civil Law of Succession, for the Common Law of Descents.

In every one of these opinions, I think, Judge Tucker was clearly mistaken. As to the terms of the Statute: if they could be understood, as he probably understood them, they would indeed establish his rule. But, the word "children," in the 14th, was used in opposition to "descendants," in the 10th section, and mean children in the most restricted sense of the word; and the words "male and female, in the same degree," refer to the deceased ancestors, whose children might come into the partition, and not to those who came into the partition. To suggest these constructions is, to insure an assent to them.

As to the question, whether it was intended to abolish, in toto, the Common Law of Descents, enough has already been said. The construction given by Judge Tucker to our Statute, by which grand-children (all the children being dead) would succeed per capita, is clearly in opposition to the Civil Law, the Statute of Distributions, and the Common Law, all of which concur in this particular, and in principle in this particular only, although in a few cases amongst collaterals, the opposite principles of the Civil Law, and Statute of Distributions conforming to it, and the Common Law of Descents, produce the same practical effects, as lines drawn at right angles to each other meet at a single point. Nor does Judge Tucker's rule conform, either in principle, or effect, with that of the Civil Law, and Statute of Distributions, in respect to the succession of ascendants, or collaterals, as has been already sufficiently shown. Nor is there the slightest intimation to be found in the provisions, or phraseology of our Statute of Descents *indicating an intention to adopt any single principle of the Civil Law, or of the Statute of Distributions: the latter selecting the distributees according to their personal proximity, without regard to the proximity of their ancestors; the former selecting the heirs according to the Common Law rule, founded wholly upon the principle of unlimited representation, on account of the proximity of the Common ancestor, without regard to their individual proximity: the Civil Law and Statute of Distributions allowing of no representation amongst collaterals, except in a single, and very particular case, the Statute allowing it in all cases, or at least, as Judge Tucker himself admits, in all cases where persons in unequal degrees succeed; a case which could not happen in the Civil Law amongst collaterals, except in the single case alluded to; the nearest in degree in all other cases, absolutely excluding the more remote. Our Statute speaks of estates of inheritance descending in parcenary to the kindred of the intestate, heirs inheriting, and ancestors transmitting inheritance: the Statute of Distribution speaks of children, and those who legally represent them, and of a distribution equally amongst the next of kin in equal degree; than which, no two things can be more different. In short, Judge Tucker's rule does not agree with the principles of any system of laws ever existing in the world, so far as we are informed, either in respect to the distribution of personal, or the descent of real estate. I repeat, that I cannot believe that the authors of our Statute intended to establish a new, and hitherto unheard of rule of descent and distribution, proceeding upon no uniform principle, and varying the interests of the successors to intestates' estates indefinitely, according to accidental circumstances; and especially, I cannot conceive that they could have intended to establish such a principle by the strange expedient of giving an equivocal example, from which no general rule can be possibly adduced, with any degree of confidence.

408 *The Decree should be reversed, and the estate divided in stirpes, considering the deceased brother and sister of the intestate as the ultimate stocks.

JUDGE COALTER.

The Legislature, in framing the Statute of Descents, seem to have pursued the policy of the Civil Law, in applying the same provisions to the descent of lands, and the distribution of personal property.

Our course of distributing the personal subject, and that of Great Britain, were nearly the same; both conforming, in a great degree, to the Civil Law. In England though, and in this country before the Revolution, the principles of the Feudal System, engrafted on our Laws, made it impossible that lands should go as personals. In fact, the course of descents, as regulated by Federal principles, had been established long before there was any Statute for the distribution of personal property.

The principles of our Revolution, though, required that those Feudal doctrines of primogeniture, preference of males over females, that lands should not lineally ascend, the rules as to the half-blood, and the blood of the first purchaser, &c., should be done away, and that the course of descents should conform to this new state of things. In other words, that the realty and personalty should go together to the same persons, and that both should go, not according to the former course of descents of lands, but (with some modifications,) according to the former course of distribution of personals, pursuing the supposed preference, arising from natural affection. Had the Legislature simply provided, that lands should thereafter descend to the same persons, who would have been entitled to them, if it was personal property, according to the Statute of Distributions, it would have been a Statute of Descents in all respects, perfectly suited to our new political existence, and one, in all its essential attributes, very similar to the 409 *Statute that was passed. Hence I conclude, that that Statute was drawn very much from our Statute of Distributions, the Civil Law, and the decisions of Courts on that subject, and being diametrically in conflict with almost every principle of the Common Law, founded on the Feudal System in relation to descents, it was entirely to repeal or abrogate that Law on this subject. This seems to have been Judge Tucker's opinion, in his commentary on this Statute, as well as the opinion of this Court, expressed in the case of Browne v. Turberville, 2 Call, 390. It seems to be admitted, that the case before us, if not a casus omissus, is not expressly provided for by the Statute; and the consequence is, that we must either consider the case as one to which we cannot extend the Statute, and must, therefore, determine it according to some pre-existing Law, remaining still in force; or, we must bring it within the equity and meaning of the Statute, by extending the positive provisions therein found, in regard to like cases, to the one before us.

This is a case for the partition of real, and the distribution of personal estate of an intestate; and if it cannot be decided under the Statute, what antecedent Law is to regulate us in disposing of these two subjects?

Our Statute of Distributions is now a very short one. 1st vol. V. L. p. 382. It is to be found, originally in the Act of 1785, and now in the 29th section of the present Statute of Wills, Intestacy and Distributions, which, after providing for the wife, declares, "That the surplus shall be distributed in the same proportions, and to the same persons, as lands are directed to descend, in and by an Act of the General Assembly, entitled, 'An Act to reduce into one the several Acts, directing the Course of Descents.'" If that Act, though, does not provide for the case, either expressly, or by proper construction, and if we are to look to antecedent Laws, either as to the persons to take, or the proportions in which they are to take, to what must we

410 look? It seems to me, we cannot look to the Common Law as to the personal subject; for, that never regulated the distribution of personal estates. If that Law, therefore, is still in force, and applies to the real subject now before us, and will be the rule of decision as to it, still it seems to me, we cannot look to it as to the personality; for, it is to go with the land only, where it can go to the same persons, and in the same proportions, as lands are to go under the Act. If we cannot ascertain by the Act, as well the persons, as the proportions in which they are to take, but must look to the Common Law for either, the provision in the Law, as to the personality, seems to fail. If we should even find, by looking into the pre-existing Statutes of Distributions, and applying them to this case, that they would carry the personality to the same persons, and in the same proportions, as the Common Law would carry the realty, still it would not, I apprehend, be the Common Law that would give the rule, but the former Statutes of Distributions, if we consider them as so far unrepealed. But, should it be found, that the Statute of Distributions would carry the personality to different persons, or in different proportions, then we must sever the personality from the realty, or apply the Common Law rule to the personality. It is true, there is a very apparent intention in the Legislature, that the realty and personality should, in all cases, go together to the same persons, and in the same proportions; but, that is evidently also under the idea, that every case was provided for by the Statute. Had it been suggested to the Legislature, that possibly some cases were not provided for, and there had been a general clause framed for the purpose of designating what pre-existing Law should give the rule in such cases, what would they have said? It seems to me, they would have said, as the Statute had broken up the whole foundation of the Common Law in this respect, and had, in all its essential features, adopted the Statutes and decisions on the subject of Distributions, that in all omitted cases, or 411 cases of doubt, the great policy *of the Statute should be pursued, and those laws and decisions adhered to, rather than the exploded Common Law rules, with their feudal origin.

But, there is no such clause expressly directing us the one way or the other. On the contrary, the Legislature believed they had provided for every case that could arise; and it seems to me, that this is so apparent, that we cannot resist the conclusion, that as well the Common Law as the Statutes of Distribution, were considered as entirely abrogated; and it therefore becomes our duty, if that can be done on any fair principle of construction, to extend the Act to the case before us.

Before going into this enquiry, however, let us attend a little more minutely to the Common Law course of Descents, as contrasted with that of the Civil Law, from which latter the Statute of Distributions, and the Act under consideration, have been drawn.

The first Common Law rule of Descents is, "That inheritances shall lineally descend to the issue of the person who last died actually seised, in infinitum, but shall never lineally ascend." 2 Bl. Com. 208. This is contrary to the Civil Law; was founded on feudal principles, and is entirely altered by our Law.

A second general Rule or Canon is, "That the male issue shall be admitted before the female." 2 Bl. Com. 212, 213. This is contrary to the Civil Law, and is absolutely put an end to by our Statute.

Thirdly, "Where there are two or more males, in equal degree, the eldest only shall inherit; but the females altogether." Ib. 214. This rule of primogeniture was also against the Roman Law, and is abrogated by our Statute.

If then, in any case, we are obliged to resort to the Common Law for the rule, we cannot decide the case still, according to the Common Law; for, we must pay no attention to these Rules or Canons, but must in fact, so far decide the case, as if no such Rules or Canons had ever existed. But, these Rules or Canons have had a 412 most important *effect on the doctrines of the jus representationis of the Common Law, so as to make it what it never would have been, but for those Canons. And hence a great difficulty has arisen in my mind, in considering how we can decide what the Common Law rule of jus representationis is, when we are bound to strip it of those very Rules and Canons, which gave it its present form and shape. In other words, our Legislature have abrogated the Common Law, in the three particulars aforesaid, the existence of which in England had caused certain rules to be established in relation to the jus representationis, which would not otherwise have existed, and yet we are to consider the Common Law jus representationis, as applicable to this country, and still in force in cases not expressly provided for by our Statute. On the contrary, I feel irresistibly led to conclude, that our Legislature, having abrogated the reasons why the jus representationis of the Common Law was made to differ from the jus representationis of the Civil Law, and which would have been the Law of England too, but for those reasons, the whole must be considered as abrogated. The reason of the Law is the life of the Law. It is not usual to repeal the Common Law as you do Statutes; but, where a principle is introduced in conflict with the reason on which it is founded, it must be considered as altered; otherwise, a Law must exist after its life is extinguished. Let us see how the Common Law rule of representation came to be what it is. A fourth Canon of Descents is, "That the lineal descendants, in infinitum, of any person deceased, shall represent their ancestor; that is, shall stand in the same place that the person himself would have done, had he been living." 2 Bl. Com. 216. Thus, the child, grand-child, or great grand-child, (male or female) of the eldest son succeeds before the youngest son, and so in infinitum. And these representatives take neither more nor less, but just so much as their principles would have done. As, if there be two sisters, M.

and C.; and M. dies leaving six 413 daughters; and then *John Stiles, the father of the two sisters, dies, without other issue: these six daughters will take among them exactly the same their mother would have done, had she been living; that is, a moiety of the land in coparcenary. This taking by representation, is called succession in stirpes, according to the roots, since all the branches inherit the same share that their root, whom they represent, would have done. This Blackstone says, is different from the Roman Law. In the descending line, he says, the right of representation continued in infinitum, and the inheritance still descended in stirpes: as, if one of three daughters died, leaving ten children; and then the father died, the two surviving daughters had each one third, and the ten grand-children one third between them. And so among collaterals. If any person in equal degree with the person represented, were still subsisting, (as if the deceased left one brother and two nephews, the son of another brother,) the succession was still guided by the roots; but, if both the brethren were dead, leaving issue, then (I apprehend, he says,) their representatives, in equal degree, became themselves principals, and shared per capita, they being now themselves in the next degree to their ancestor in their own right, and not by right of representation; whereas, he says, the Law of England would only divide it into two parts, giving one part to each set of children, however unequal in numbers.

This mode of representations, he says, is a necessary consequence of the double preference given by our Law, first, to the male issue, and next, to the first born among the males; to both of which the Roman Law is a stranger. For, if all the children of three sisters were in England to claim per capita, in their own right, as next of kin, without respect to the stocks, and those children were partly male and partly female, then the eldest male among them would exclude not only his own brethren and sisters, but all the issue of the other two daughters; whereas, by dividing the inheritance according to 414 the stocks, the rule of "descents" is kept uniform. The issue of an eldest son excludes all, as the son himself would, if living; but the issue of two daughters divide the inheritance between them, provided their mothers (if living,) would have done so, and among these several issues, or representatives, the same preference of males and of primogeniture prevails.

This preference given to males, and this Common Law rule of primogeniture, made it necessary then to vary the jus representationis as to real estates, from what it was by the Civil Law, and as applicable to personal estates, by the Statute of Distributions; but, as this reason for the variance is done away by our Act; and as that Act, when we come to examine it, I think will be found to provide for a succession in capita, where the parties to take are classed in the same degree, and only resorts to the right of representation where some of them are dead, leaving issue, and some living, I cannot perceive how it is, that such essential changes in our Law, affecting the very reason in which the variance in the Common Law right of representation, from the Civil Law right, is founded, shall nevertheless be considered as leaving that Common Law rule in full force.

The case before us, is one of collateral kindred, the children of a brother and sister; and if it had been a case of the distribution of personalty only, and the Act of Descents never had passed, but the case had been decided on the Statute of Distributions, either in England or here, those in equal degree would have taken equal portions. This is decided, as I understand, in the case of Walsh v. Walsh, Prec. in Ch. 54; that is to say, the children of brothers and sisters alive, would take the whole per capita, in exclusion of the issue of any child of a child of a brother or sister who should be dead, leaving issue. This was decided in Pett's Case, 1 P. Wms. 25: See also, Carter v. Crawley, Sir Thomas Raymond, 496; the Statute of Distributions prohibiting representation beyond brothers' and sisters' children.

Whether, or how far this is changed
415 by our Statute "of Descents, either expressly or by sound construction, is the question before us. But, in such case, had the subject been really the course of descents in England by the Common Law would have been very different, as we have before seen.

But, suppose it had been a case in the direct descending line, and a case of personalty, and decided in England, under the Statute of Distributions; and the case was one between children of children, the parents being all dead, how would it be decided?

In the Notes on Justinian, by Cooper, page 394, I find these observations on 118th Novel: "The three first chapters of this Novel," says he, "deserve the attentive consideration of the reader, not only because they contain the latest policy of the Civil Law, in regard to the disposition of the estates of intestates; but because they are the foundation of our Statute Law in this respect." He refers to Holt's Cases, 259, 1 P. Wms. 27; Prec. in Ch. 593, and Sir Thomas Raymond, 496. And he says, "They are still almost of continual use, by being the general guide of the Courts of England, which hold cognizance of distributions, in all those cases in which our own Laws have either been silent, or not sufficiently express." Speaking of the succession per stirpes, he says, "Nothing is more clear in the Civil Law, than that grand-children even when alone, (although they descend from various stocks, and are unequal in their numbers,) would take the estate of their deceased grand-father per stirpes, and not per capita. Suppose therefore, that Titius should die, leaving grand-children by three different sons already dead; to wit, three by one son, six by another, and twelve by another; each of these classes of grand-children would take a third of the estate, without any regard to the inequality of the numbers in each class. But, as to this point in England, the Law Reports mention no judicial determination; yet it seems probable, that the Courts, in which distributions are cognizable, would order the division of an estate in such 416 a case to be made "per capita; and this, partly from a motive of equity, and partly from a consideration of the intent of the Statute, relating to the estates of intestates: for, the Statute directs an equal and just distribution, and, when the Act mentions representation, it must be understood to refer to it, in those cases only, where representation is necessary to prevent exclusion, but not to refer to it, in those cases, where all the claimants are in equal degree, and therefore can take suo quisque jure, each in his own right."

In a subsequent part of of his Notes, (page 546,) he refers to Dr. Taylor's Civil Law, and gives an extract therefrom, in which, (page 551,) it is laid down: 1st. That brothers and sisters alone, of the whole blood, succeed in capita, to the exclusion of the half-blood. 2d. Brothers' and sisters' children, concurring with brothers and sisters, succeed in stirpes. 3dly. Nephews alone succeed in capita, none in stirpes: for the succeed (now) in their own right, and not by representation. This I understand to be our Law, with the further provision to be deduced from it, that if any of them be dead, leaving issue, that issue is to come in or concur with those alive who are in equal degree, but per stirpes.

In England, there was no policy, in regard to the support of their aristocracy, requiring that the personal estate should go as the real, and so they adopted the Roman Law in distributing it; and it is believed by this able writer, that though there is no adjudged case to that effect, that the sound construction of the Statute would lead the Courts to explode even the Civil Law doctrine of representation, except where it is necessarily resorted to, to prevent exclusion. But our Statute, so far as it expressly speaks, seems to adopt precisely that course. We have no aristocracy to support, no principle of policy which would require, that in any event the realty and personality shall go in different ways. On the contrary, the great policy of the Statute evidently is, to seek in the ascending line, and in every direction, those for whom a supposed preference, arising from natural affection, might exist, and to give the *whole estate real and personal, to them. It forms them into classes, and where a class consists of more than one, and all are alive, they take per capita; if any are dead, leaving issue, which if it were not in the class, would be excluded, the principle of representation is, in such cases, and only in such cases, resorted to.

The great and leading policy of the Statute, it seems to me, is the polar star in this enquiry, and if steadily kept in view, will lead us to a sound and consistent construction of the Act, and will cover every possible case under it.

The Statute on which I shall make my observations, is that which is found in the first volume of the Revised Code of 1819, page 355, which is the same as to the subject before us, with the Law as it stands in the Revised Code of 1794, but in which there is some transposition of sections.

1st. The first section provides that the inheritance of an intestate shall descend and pass in parcenary to his kindred, male and female, in the following course:

It shall go in parcenary, not subject to all the incidents of estates in parcenary at the Common Law; for there, if one of two or more daughters is dead, leaving sons and daughters, the eldest son of such daughter would take per stirpes with the surviving daughters. I would, therefore, construe the word parcenary to mean in equal shares, as contradistinguished for tenants in common, and joint tenants. It is to descend then in equal shares to his kindred; what kindred? Not to those in equal degree of consanguinity, though that is a very governing principle in arranging the classes, but according to the classes or course fixed by this Law. That is to say:

2d. "To his children, or their descendants, if any there be." Coupling this with the sixteenth section, the intention of the Legislature was: That if all the children were alive whether male or female, they should take equal shares, per capita; but if any child was dead, leaving descendants, those descendants are to take by 418 virtue of the *second section, and however numerous, would take per capita, and equally with the children, for they are in the same class with them, but for the operation of the sixteenth section, which provides, that where the issue of those children which are dead, come into partition with the living children, they shall take per stirpes, the share of their deceased parent.

But, suppose A. dies intestate, his children B. and C. having died before him, B. having left three children, and C. six, and all these children are alive; how does the estate go? These are descendants of the children of the intestate. They are expressly named in the second class, and by the first section, are to take equally, unless, as in this other case, the sixteenth section provides otherwise; but there is no provision at all there, for they are all equal, and can each take in his own right, and none are excluded. But, suppose one of the children of B. is dead, leaving eight children, these are descendants of the child of the intestate, and are expressly called to the inheritance, by the second section, and they must take per capita, unless they can be brought within the influence of the sixteenth section; they cannot be excluded altogether, nor can you refer them to the rules either of the Common or Civil Law. They stand under the express words of our Statute, as inheriting equally with the eight surviving children of B. and C., and must each take one-sixteenth part of the estate, under the first and second sections, unless you can bring them within the sixteenth section, and so we may go on and suppose a thousand cases in the descending line; as if all the children of B. and C. had been dead, all leaving children, and all alive, or many of them dead, leaving children, &c. You cannot send them to the Common or Civil Law rule of representation. By the express provision of the first and second clauses, they being all descendants of children, are placed in the second class, and are to take equally, unless there is something in the Law which expressly, or by sound construction, directs otherwise.

419 *My opinion is, that we ought to apply the great principle of the 16th section to the case, to wit, that where some in equal degree are dead, leaving issue, which issue are to come into partition with those alive, they shall take per stirpes. It is true, that I do not resort to the principle of representation here, in order to prevent the exclusion of such issue, because they are expressly included in the Law, but I resort to it, in fixing the share they are to take, so as not to counteract the great principle of seeking for all those who would be supposed to be the nearest objects of affection, and to give it in proportion to such supposed predilections, and in the proportions pointed out by this Act in similar cases. This, though, is equally a case omitted, or rather not expressly provided for by our Statute, with that before us, and we have no means of applying any just rule to it, except by extending the 16th section to it.

3d. "If there be no children, or their descendants, then to the father."

4th. If there be no father, then to his mother, brothers and sisters, and their descendants, or such of them as there be." Whose descendants? Not those of the mother, by an after-marriage. They would be brothers and sisters of the half-blood, subject to the rules as to the half-blood; but descendants of brothers and sisters. There is no mother, though, nor brothers nor sisters, but there was a brother and a sister, who are dead, the sister having left four children, and the brother one. These, say, are all alive at the death of the intestate. They are descendants of a brother and sister, they are expressly called to the inheritance by the fourth section, and, according to the first section, they are to take equal shares, unless something in the Law prevents. The sixteenth section, though, makes no provision for a succession amongst these parties, per stirpes. There was no necessity; they are all descendants, and stand under the Act by that description, and are entitled to the inheritance, and they are moreover all in 420 equal degree of consanguinity, and it is to be presumed, *equally in the affections of the intestate. They will take equally. So far, it seems to me, as to such persons, there is no omission in the Statute. But, it turns out, that two of the children of the sister are dead, leaving issue, unequal in numbers, but amounting in all to eight. These are descendants of a sister, and expressly called to the inheritance, and must take per capita, (unless we can apply the sixteenth section to them,) with the other descendants. We can no more in this case, than in the other, as it seems to me, refer them, either to the Common or Civil Law. They stand, in the words of our own Statute, and the only question is, whether a sound interpretation of the whole Law will enable us to say, that they should take per stirpes? It seems to me, for the reasons above suggested, as to the other case put, that we can and ought to do so.

This is the more desirable, if it will, as we are told it will, be consonant to the doctrines heretofore generally understood and acted on.

This will be the safe course. Nothing that has heretofore taken place, will be unsettled. We cannot act prospectively, as the Legislature can; we may unsettle many estates long since settled. The Legislature, if we err in the construction, can put us right, which, acting prospectively, can do no injury. The real and personal estate can go together under the same Law, as was intended, and this will be agreeable to the great principles of the Act above noticed.

If we do not do this, but resort to the Common Law jus representationis, to ascertain the proportions, what are we to do with the personal subject in this case? If we give it to the same persons directed by the Statute, still we cannot give it in the proportions directed by the Statute; for, we look not to the Statute, but to the Common Law, for these proportions. They are different in this case, from what the proportions were according to the Statute of Distributions; and we must then 421 do violence to *the Act, either by expounding it to mean, that the personal subject shall go to the same persons, and in the same proportions, to whom the land goes, whether the proportions are fixed by the Statute, or by the Common Law; or, we must consider the Statute of Distributions also, so far, as unrepealed, and vary the proportions, or we must consider it as repealed, and that the case is one not within the present Statute, and consequently, that no distribution can be made. I think my construction most consistent with the true intention of the Legislature, and that the Decree must be affirmed.

JUDGE CABELL.

This is a controversy about the division of the estate of Anthony Gardner, who died intestate, without issue, without father, and without mother, brother, or sister, living at the time of his death. He had had a brother and a sister, but both of them had died before him, leaving issue; and it is among the descendants of his brother and sister, that his estate must be divided. The brother left an only child, E. M. Davis, the Appellant: the sister left two sons, living at the death of Anthony Gardner; two grand-children by one deceased daughter, and six grand-children by another deceased daughter. It thus appears, that the relations of the intestate, who were to inherit his estate, were one niece on the part of his brother, two nephews on the part of his sister, and the children of two deceased nieces on the part of his sister. No question can possibly be made as to the right of any of these relations to participate in the inheritance; for, being descendants of a brother and of a sister, they are called to the inheritance by the express words of the fourth section of our Act of Assembly directing the course of descents. But, the question is, as to the portions in which they are to participate. It was not pretended by any of them, that the estate was to be divided 422 among them all equally, share and share alike. It *was on the other hand contended by the Appellant, that the intestate, having had only one brother and one sister, both of whom died before him, leaving issue, the estate was to be divided into moieties; one of which she claimed for herself, as the only representative of her deceased father, the brother of the intestate; leaving the other moiety to be assigned to the descendants of the sister of the intestate, as representing her. The Chancellor, however, decided, that the estate should, in the first place, be divided into five parts, according to the original number of the nephews and nieces of the intestate, and that one of these parts should be assigned to the Appellant; one to each of the nephews on the part of the sister; one to the descendants of one of the deceased nieces; and the other to the descendants of the other deceased niece. And the question is, as to the propriety of this decision.

This is a very important question; and this is the first occasion on which the Courts have been called on to decide it. Such a question could hardly have arisen before the first of January, 1787; for, until that time, the Common Law, regulating the descent of real estate, and the Statute of Distributions regulating the distribution of personal, were too plain to admit of doubt. But, the Common Law paid but little regard to the supposed preference of the intestate, founded on natural affection, and was influenced, almost exclusively, by certain political considerations, which, although well suited to the Government of England, were unnecessary to, or inconsistent with, the Republican Institutions which we had established. A change in the course of descents took place, as a necessary consequence of our change of Government. This change was effected by the Act of 1785, ch. 60, which went into operation on the first of January, 1787. This Act paid a due regard to the dictates of natural affection, and avoided the aristocratical tendencies of the former system. It accordingly abolished the preference which had been given to males over females.

It abolished all preference on account *of primogeniture or seniority.

It paid no regard to the blood of the first purchaser; and it called to the inheritance relations in the ascending line, and relations of the half-blood. But, the most important of these changes were effected not so much by laying down general principles or Canons of Descent, as by stating particular classes of persons who should inherit. Thus the Act directs:

1. That henceforth, when any person having title to any real estate of inheritance, shall die intestate as to such estate, it shall descend, and pass in parcenary to his kindred, male and female, in the following course; that is to say:

2. To his children, or their descendants, if any there be:

3. If there be no children, nor their descendants, then to his father:

4. If there be no father, then to his mother, brothers and sisters and their descendants, or such of them as there be:

5. If there be no mother, nor brother, nor sister, nor their descendants, then the inheritance shall be divided into two moieties; one of which shall go to the paternal, the other to the maternal kindred, in the following course, that is to say:

6. First to the grand-father:

7. If there be no grand-father, then to the grand-mother, uncles and aunts, on the same side, and their descendants, or such of them as there be:

8. If there be no grand-mother, uncle nor aunt, nor their descendants, then to the great grand-fathers, or great grand-father, if there be but one:

9. If there be no great grand-father, then to the great grand-mothers, or great grand-mother, if there be but one, and the brothers and sisters of the grand-fathers and grand-mothers, and their descendants, or such of them as there be:

10. And so on in other cases, without end; passing to the nearest lineal male ancestors, and for want of them, to the lineal female ancestors, in the same 424 degree, and the *descendants of such male and female lineal ancestors, or to such of them as there be:

Then follows a section, declaring that none shall inherit, except children of the intestate, unless in being at the intestate's death.

The next section provides, that if there be no paternal kindred, the whole shall go to the maternal; if no maternal, the whole shall go to the paternal: if none of either, the whole to go to the wife or husband; and if the wife or husband be dead, it shall go to her or his kindred, in like course as if such wife or husband had survived the intestate, and then died entitled to the estate.

The next section designates the manner in which the whole and half-blood shall take.

There are some other provisions, which will be hereafter noticed for a special purpose.

These details are so minute, and at the same time so comprehensive, that it is believed to be impossible to conceive a case of intestacy, that is not expressly provided for by the Act, so far as relates to the persons, or classes of persons, who are to inherit. As to the persons, or classes of persons, therefore, who are to inherit, it may be justly inferred that the Legislature intended to provide by the Act of 1785, a complete and perfect system, so as to render unnecessary and improper, a reference to any other Code or System of Laws whatever. And as there was no longer any good reason why the distribution of personal, should be different from the descent of real estate, the same Legislature, by a subsequent Act, declared that the personal estate, after payment of debts, and provision for the wife, shall be distributed in the same proportions, and to the same persons, as lands are directed to descend in and by the Act directing the course of descents.

But, although the course of descents of real, and the distribution of personal estate, is rendered thus full, complete and perfect, as to those persons who shall be the distributees of the one, and the 425 heirs of the other, yet it is "manifest that the provisions of the Act are not equally full, complete and perfect, as to the proportions in which the estate is to be divided among those who are called to its participation. The express provisions of the Act, so far as relates to this subject, are far from embracing all the cases which may occur. The only part of the Act which expressly relates to this subject, is the 14th section of the Act of 1785, answering to the 16th section of our present Law. It is in these words: "And, where the children of the intestate, or his mother, brothers and sisters, or his grand-mother, uncles and aunts, or any of his female lineal ancestors living, with the children of his deceased lineal ancestors, male and female in the same degree, come into the partition, they shall take per capita; that is to say, by persons; and where, a part of them being dead, and a part living, the issue of those dead have right to partition, such issue shall take per stirpes, or by stocks, that is to say, the shares of their deceased parent." It is perfectly clear, that this section does not provide expressly for the case now before us; nor does it provide expressly for any case where all the persons of any particular class designated in any of the previous sections, are dead, and the estate is claimed by their descendants. It does not provide, for example, for the case where all the children of the intestate are dead, some of them leaving descendants; nor where the mother, brothers and sisters are all dead, some of them leaving descendants; nor where the grand-mother, uncles and aunts, are all dead, some of them leaving descendants; nor to the case where any other female lineal ancestors, and the children of deceased lineal ancestors, male and female, in the same degree, are all dead, some of them leaving descendants: and it leaves such cases unprovided for, whether the descendants stand in equal or in unequal degrees of kindred to the intestate. There is not only a failure in the Statute to provide expressly for such cases; but there is no principle laid down, which will give a general rule. It cannot be maintained, I think, that equality, 426 or *sameness of degree of kindred to the intestate, is to be the ruling principle; for, in the first place, there is nothing said in the Statute, about the degree of kindred of those who are to take, in relation to the intestate; and in the next place, all the cases of equal division specified in the Statute, save one, are cases where the persons taking the estate, do not stand in equal degree of kindred to the intestate. Thus, the mother, brothers and sisters, the grand-mother, uncles and aunts, &c. &c., when all alive, divide the inheritance equally, although they do not all stand in equal degrees of kindred to the intestate.

If the great and wise men who framed our Statute of Descents, had intended to lay down in the Statute itself, a general rule, or a principle furnishing a general rule, for regulating the proportions in which an estate is to be divided among the different heirs, they would have effected their object in terms precise, yet comprehensive so as to admit of no question; as they had done in other parts of the same Statute, in relation to the persons, or classes of persons, who are to inherit. But, are we to suppose that they intended to leave us without any general rule on this important subject, because none is laid down in the Statute. Such a supposition is too disparaging to them, to be entertained even for a moment. On the contrary, the absence of a general rule, in the Statute, is proof conclusive to my mind, that the cases not provided for in the Statute, were considered as being provided for by the Common Law; a law, which all must admit to be in force, unless it has been abrogated by some Statute.

If the Common Law be in force, it contains a principle, familiar to us all, that will remove every difficulty, and solve every question that can possibly arise concerning the question in controversy. That principle is, "that the lineal descendants, in infinitum, of any person deceased, shall represent their ancestor: that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done, had he been living."

2 Bl. Com. 216. Let us apply this 427 principle *to this case, in order to test its operation. If the brother and sister of Anthony Gardner had survived him, they would have shared his estate equally, by the 4th section of the Act. But both to them being dead, leaving descendants, those descendants will represent their respective parents; that is, will stand in the same place as they would have done, had they been living. One half of the estate, therefore, would be assigned to the descendants of the brother, and one half to the descendants of the sister. And in making the subdivision among the descendants of the brother and of the sister, if it should happen that any of them shall have died, leaving descendants, these last will also represent their parent, by standing in the same place as he would have done had he been living; for, the principle of representation, extends in infinitum. Thus the Appellant, E. M. Davis, the sole descendant of the brother, and representing him, would be entitled to the full moiety which her father would have taken, had he been living. The descendants of the sisters representing her, would take among them, the moiety that the sister herself would have taken, had she been living. But, as some of these descendants of the sister were dead, leaving children, who would represent their parents, the moiety which would have gone to the sister, had she been living, would be divided into four parts, according to the original number of her children, one of which would go to each of her two surviving children, and as to the other two parts, one of them would be divided equally among the children of one of her deceased daughters, and the other among the children of her other deceased daughter.

But the question still recurs, has this Common Law principle of representation been repealed? I have admitted that the Legislature intended to provide, by the Statute, a full, complete, and perfect system, so far as relates to the designation of the persons who were to inherit: and I believe that there never was any human intention carried into more complete and perfect execution. But, while they intended to abrogate the Common Law

428 entirely, as *to the persons who are to inherit, where is the evidence of any intention that these persons shall inherit on principles of descent different from those which prevailed at the Common Law. If this last intention had been entertained by the Legislature, why did they not give unequivocal evidence of it, as they did in relation to the other intention? If they had intended to do away the ancient and well established Common Law principles of descent, upon points other than those relating to the designation of the persons who are to inherit, they would have declared the new principles which they intended to substitute for the old. But there is no such declaration, except in a few instances, which I will hereafter notice. Whilst there is the utmost possible minuteness in designating the persons, or classes of persons, who are to inherit, the principles on which these persons are to inherit, are only to be gathered from the general expressions in the first section of the Act, that the estate shall descend and pass in parcenary, to his kindred, male and female. These expressions do not give the principles directly, but they do it indirectly, by necessarily referring us to the Common Law, to which they belong, and to which they are familiar, for an explanation of the principles of descent, and of the nature, qualities, and incidents of an estate in parcenary. That this was the intention of the Legislature, seems obvious from other parts of the Act; for wherever they intended to change any of the Common Law principles of descent, provisions precisely commensurate to the object, are expressly introduced. As proof of this, I refer to the clause declaring that, "no right in the inheritance shall accrue to any person whatever, other than to children of the intestate, unless they be in being, and capable in Law to take as heirs, at the time of the intestate's death;" and to the clause declaring that "bastards shall be capable of inheriting or of transmitting inheritance on the part of their mothers." These two clauses relate to well known Common Law principles of descent, which it was not intended to change entirely, *but only to modify; and these principles are still left to their Common Law operation, except so far as they are modified by these clauses. Where it was intended entirely to reverse a Common Law principle of descent, the Legislature have done it in terms well calculated to produce that effect: as, in the clause declaring that "in making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a defendant, that any ancestor, through whom he derives his descent from the intestate, is or hath been an alien." Had it not been for this clause, the alienage of an intermediate ancestor would still have remained a bar, as at the Common Law. And this proves that the Act of 1785, was not intended to abrogate the whole Common Law on the subject of descents; for, if a total abrogation was intended, where was the necessity of negating particular parts only?

Judge Pendleton's opinion in Browne v. Turberville, 2 Call, 390, is strongly relied on by those who advocate the total abrogation of the Common Law. No man is more disposed than I am, to respect the opinion of that great Judge. But his opinions, like the opinions of all other Judges, must be considered in reference to the questions that are presented to them judicially. When they go beyond the very point that is presented by the case they are called on to decide, they are extra-judicial, and cease to be authority. The question in Browne v. Turberville, had no reference whatever to the Common Law principle of representation. It was a question as to the persons who should inherit; and it was contended in that case, that it was the Common Law, and not the Act of Assembly that should determine the person who should be the heir. In deciding this question, he said, that "the Act of 1785, has totally done away the Common Law, as to the course of descents;" and that under that Act "no possible case, not provided for, can happen, so as to let in the rule of the Common Law." He also says, "the rights of primogeniture are wholly abolished, and wherever there are more persons than one, of equal degree of kindred 430 to the intestate, *they share equally in the succession." But this last observation of Judge Pendleton, so far as it would seem to establish a rule, that equality of degree of kindred, shall produce equality of partition, is liable to the general remark made above, that going beyond the point before the Court, it is not to be regarded as authority. There was no question in that case, as to the proportions in which those clearly entitled to the estate, should divide it. And I think it perfectly clear, that in making the observation about equality of partition, Mr. Pendleton had no reference to the difference between a succession per capita, and a succession per stirpes; but was merely alluding to the division of estates among the many persons who are made heirs by our Law, as contrasted with the sole succession by primogeniture in England. His mind was bent upon the question, who was to be heir, and not upon the question, whether, of many persons admitted to be heirs, some should take per capita, and some per stirpes.

Judge Tucker also, in Templeman and Steptoe, 1 Munford, 339, uses very strong expressions as to the Act of 1785, having entirely rescinded "all former Rules and Canons of inheritance, and succession to estates, real and personal, within this Commonwealth, whether established by the Common Law, or by Statute." But, this opinion of Judge Tucker, if it was intended to extend farther than to those Canons and Rules of inheritance, for ascertaining the persons entitled to inherit, was extra-judicial, and not authority; for, in Templeman and Steptoe, as in Browne v. Turberville, the question before the Court was, as to the persons who should inherit, and not whether the heirs were to take per capita, or per stirpes.

The present is the first case in which the question has been judicially presented, whether the Common Law principle of representation, or succession per stirpes, is still to be looked to as providing for the cases not specified and provided for by the Act of 1785; or, whether that part of the Common Law has been abrogated 431 by the Act of 1785: "And in the absence of authority, we must decide it on principle.

I have already endeavoured to prove, by the positive enactments of the Act of 1785, an intention in the Legislature to leave the Common Law, as to this principle, unrepealed. But, the subject is susceptible of another, and perhaps a stronger, aspect.

A former Law, whether Common or Statute, can be repealed or abrogated, only by express terms, or by necessary implication. It is not pretended, that the Act of 1785 abrogated the Common Law principle now under discussion, by express terms. If it has been abrogated at all, that effect has been produced by necessary implication only, on the well known principle, that leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant. But, the repugnance between two Laws, that is to produce that effect, must be such, that the two Laws cannot stand together. And as it is the repugnance that works the repeal, the repeal will be limited to the extent of the repugnance. Those parts of the former Law, not repugnant to the new Law, remain as much in force, as if the new Law had never been adopted. Let us apply these principles to the case before us, and see how far, and how far only, they will carry us. The preference given by the Common Law, to males over females; the respect paid to primogeniture, and to the blood of the first purchaser; the exclusion of the ascending line, and of all collateral relations of the half-blood: all these parts of the Common Law are clearly repugnant to the provisions of the Act of 1785, and are admitted by all to have been consequently done away. But, the Common Law principle of representation is repugnant to no principle of the Act of 1785. On the contrary, it is recognized by that Act, and expressly applied by it to several cases therein specified. It is applied expressly to every case where "part of" any particular class of persons (provided for by previous sections of the Act,) "being dead,

is applied to all such cases, by directing that "such issue shall take per stirpes, or by stocks; that is to say, the share of their deceased parent." But, the Act fails, altogether, to state how the partition shall be made, when all the persons in any class shall be dead, some or all of them leaving issue entitled to the inheritance. What greater repugnance would there be in applying the Common Law principle of representation to these last cases, than there is in applying it to those cases, to which it is expressly applied by the Act, where some of the class are living, and some dead, leaving issue? The issue who come into the partition, in the cases specified in the Act, "have right to partition," not in their own right, nor as issue of the intestate, but as issue of the deceased persons of the given class; and they take per stirpes, or by stocks; that is to say, the share of their deceased parent. The persons who would confessedly take the estate, in the cases not specified in the Act, would "have right to partition" on the same ground, viz: as issue of their parents, and not as issue of the intestate, nor in their own right. Why then should not they also "take per stirpes, or by stocks; that is to say, the share of their deceased parents?" I am clearly of opinion, that the objection as to repugnances has no foundation, so far as relates to the principle in controversy; and that, therefore, the Common Law, as to that principle, remains in full force, and is decisive of all the questions made in this case.

If it be asked where then was the necessity for the fourteenth section of the Act of 1785, (the sixteenth in our present Act concerning Descents,) the answer appears to me to be obvious. The second, fourth, seventh, ninth and tenth sections of the Act of 1785, (corresponding to the same sections in the present Law,) had directed that the estate should descend to certain classes of persons, "and to their descendants." The Legislature foresaw, that if some of the persons of a class were dead, leaving descendants, a question might 433 arise whether, under the *broad terms of these sections, the descendants, of those persons might not claim to come into the partition per capita, with those persons of the class who were still living. And the sole object of the fourteenth section was to prevent such a question being made. It therefore declared, in substance, that when none but persons of a given class come into the partition, they shall take per capita; but, that when some of the persons of a class are dead leaving issue who have right to come into the partition with other persons of the class who are still living, that then such issue shall not take per capita, but per stirpes, or by stocks.

I have, as yet, said nothing as to the provisions of our former Statute of Distribution, or as to the Civil Law, from which it was, in its most important features, confessedly taken. And, with due deference to my brethren, I think it necessary to say but little as to either of them. We do not know, and probably never shall know, the sources from which our Act of Descents was drawn. It is certain, however, that so far as relates to the descending line of kindred, the same principle of representation prevailed, in infinitum, in the Civil Law, that prevails in the same line, in the Common Law. And although there is no decision on the point, yet I have no doubt that the same principle, in infinitum, prevailed, in the descending line, under our former Statute of Distributions; for that Statute was nearly an exact transcript from the British Statute, which was formed from the previous practice of the Ecclesiastical Judges in England, who made the Civil Law, a guide from which they rarely differed. To suppose, therefore, that the framers of our present Statute of Descents, intended to abolish the principle of representation in the descending line, in all cases where the claimants of the estate stood in equal degree of kindred to the intestate, would be to erect a new principle, which, so far as relates to the descending line, was unknown to the Statute of Distributions, the Ecclesiastical Courts, and to the Civil Law.

434 *As to the collateral line, however, neither the Statute of Distributions, nor the Civil Law, tolerated the principle of representation, except in a single case, and that was where the children of a brother, or sister of the intestate come into partition with a surviving brother or sister of the intestate. In all cases, among collaterals, a different principle prevailed, viz: the principle of equality of distribution among "every of the next of kindred to the intestate, who are in equal degree;" a principle introduced into our Statute of Distributions, by an express and positive enactment. Act of 1705, ch. 7. This principle as to "the next of kindred," is unknown to the Common Law course of descents, and also to the Act of 1785. Both at Common Law, and according to the Act of 1785, concerning descents, the principle of representation prevailed in infinitum, even among collaterals. And this is evident from the fact, that the descendants of a brother of the intestate, however far such descendants may be removed from the intestate, will be preferred to the grandfathers; and the descendants of uncles and aunts, however remote, will be preferred to the great grand-fathers. If it had been intended to adopt the principle of equality of partition wherever there was equality of degree of kindred, surely those who drew our Statute of Descents, would have introduced some provision to that effect. But, it is very remarkable, that there is not in all the Act of 1785, a single expression alluding to the propinquity, equality or sameness of degree of kindred, as among those who are to inherit. The expressions "same degree," occurs twice in that Act; once in the 10th, and once in the 14th section. In the former, they were used merely to show what particular female ancestors were intended; and in the latter, they were used to designate the particular ancestors whose descendants were to be entitled to partition. Upon what ground, therefore, can it be supposed that our Legislature, in framing our Act of Descents, had reference either to the Civil Law, or to the Statute of Distribution! If they 435 *had intended that the Act of Descents should conform to the Act of Distributions, it is passing strange, that instead of saying so, they should say, as they have said, that the Act of Distribution shall conform to the Act of Descents.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, to reverse the Decree of the Chancellor, with costs, and to remand the cause, with directions that the estate of Anthony Gardner be divided into two moieties, one of which shall be assigned to the appellant, as representing her father, the brother of the intestate, and the other to be assigned to the descendants of the sister of the intestate, as representing her.

The PRESIDENT.

Great research has been employed, and some refinement indulged in, to come to very opposite conclusions on the question before the Court; nor is it for me to decide on the merits of a controversy which I am unable to perceive to belong to the decision to be pronounced. Our Statute of Descents, on which it must depend, appears to my understanding, to have enacted a course of descents, independent both of the Common and Civil Law. Its having conformed either in some particulars, does not change this character of it. A revolution, on principles derogatory both to the Common and Civil Law, was to be provided for by the enactment of a course of descents, in the general, foreign to both; and when we are called upon to decide a case, not expressly noticed by the Statute, the better rule for its construction may be extracted from the principles and analogies that may be found in it, than either from the Common or Civil Law. The cardinal Canons of the Common Law of Descents are expressly abrogated by our Statute, as inconsistent with, and repugnant to, our institutions. The jus representationis of the Common Law, which, it is said, is now to be resorted to for the purpose of expounding our Statute, followed as a consequence of those Canons of the Common

436 *Law. It was a necessary rule to preserve the principles of those Canons. It was, as is said by Blackstone, a necessary consequence of the double preference given by the Common Law, first to the male issue, and next to the first born among the males, and he might have added, of that Canon of the Common Law, which invariably provides, that inheritances shall lineally descend to the issue of the person last actually seized in infinitum: a principle to which our Statute is more repugnant than to the opposite rule of the Civil Law, which looks for the next of kindred to the intestate, as the person entitled to take the estate in suo jure proprio, having more regard to the latter than to the former; for, though our Statute has expressly pointed to the next degree of kindred (as those who are to take the estate,) but in two provisions of it, as has been noticed, and has also disregarded the rule of the Civil Law, which prefers the next of kin among collaterals; yet it is sufficiently evident, from other provisions, that its main scope is to regard natural affection, and, where those who are to take the estate stand in equal degree of kindred to the intestate, distributes it equally among them: nor is its adoption of the jus representationis where some of the stocks are dead, who, if alive, would take an equal share of the estate, an exception to that preference for the next of kin, which is so manifest in every part of it. In every point of view, if we are compelled to resort to the Common Law, or Civil Law, for a rule, by which to decide the case before us, the latter ought to be preferred, especially as the first would furnish no rule for the distribution of that part of the estate, which is personal, and would be more in conflict with our Statute, as to that portion of it which is real, than the Civil Law. It ought to be preferred, also, because, though the Act of Distribution refers to the Act of Descents for the rule for the distribution of personal estate, yet, as that Act conformed infinitely more to the Act of Distributions, which in most cases follows the rule of the Civil Law, than to the Common Law, to which its im-

437 portant provisions are utterly repugnant, the Civil Law has higher claims to furnish a rule of construction than the Common Law. But, whatever might be my impressions on this point, derived from what I might consider a more thorough examination of the relationship of our Act of Descents to the Common or Civil Law than has been made by the Judges who preceded me. I should hesitate, at least, before I unsettled what appears to me to have been decided in the cases of Browne v. Turberville, 2 Call, and Templeman v. Steptoe, 1 Munf. by all the Judges. If these decisions are not Law, it is for the Legislature, and not for this Court to review them. It is impossible to read the opinions of the Judges in the first case, and to say that they did not deem it necessary to decide the question argued by the Bar, viz: Whether the omission of the words (in case of infants) in the 7th section of the Act of Descents, was to be supplied by the Common Law, or by a construction of the section in connection with other sections of the Act, the provisions of which would be defeated by a literal construction of that Statute, and the rule of the Common Law be let in. The question was deliberately considered by all the Judges, and the President, who concurred with the other Judges, as preliminary to the decision he was about to pronounce, said "that the Act of 1785, has totally done away the Common Law as to the course of descents, has not been and cannot be doubted." This cannot be said to have been an obiter opinion, for though the Court might, upon the principles of construction resorted to by it, have interpolated the words, "in case of infants," in the 7th section, to avoid the consequence of defeating many provisions in the Act, yet it was an alternative to which it could not have been driven, if the Common Law was at hand to remedy the mischiefs which would have arisen from a literal construction of the section. All the Judges held, as may be seen in their opinions, that a recourse to the Common Law was impossible, and that the mischief could only be remedied by the construction of the whole of the Statute, taken together, or by the Legislature.

438 *In the case of Templeman v. Steptoe, the question whether he supposed omission in the Statute to provide for the case before the Court, was to be remedied by a recurrence to the Common Law, was obviously before the Court; that the Judges so considered it, cannot be doubted, or the expressions used by them would have been entirely irrelevant. Judge Tucker said, that by the Act of 1785, all former Rules and Canons of inheritance and succession to estates real and personal, within this Commonwealth, whether established by Common Law or by Statute, were entirely rescinded, abrogated, and annulled, and that they cannot be revived in any manner, but by some express legislative provision for the purpose. So decidedly did he hold this opinion, that he preferred to leave the estate in abeyance during the life of the mother of the intestate to a resort to the Common Law. Judge Roane, to support the construction he gave to the Statute, said, "that implication may be so strong and necessary, as to be equivalent to an express declaration of the Legislature, and this the rather as the 1st section of the Act of Descents purports to provide a rule of inheritance as to all cases, which idea is entirely supported by the opinion of the Court in the case of Browne v. Turberville." He considered that case as a full authority to overrule even the idea that the inheritance was in abeyance in the case before the Court. Judge Fleming said, "let me premise that in my conception the Legislature intended to provide, and has provided, for every possible case that could happen, and such was the sense of all the Judges in giving their opinions in the case of Browne v. Turberville." How it is possible now to resort to any rule of the Common Law to provide for the case before us, without resisting the authority of these cases, I am at a loss to conjecture. If the Common Law is to be looked to in the case before us, it might with some propriety have been resorted to in these cases. If so much of it only is abrogated by our Statute, as expressly provides for cases that have occurred, or may occur, then *indeed, all the Judges who have gone before us, were in profound error. That their opinions were mere dicta on points not before them, cannot be insisted on, if the cases are well examined.

Nor will the distinction which is taken between the persons who are to take the inheritance, and the amount of the portion to which they are entitled, obviate the force of these decisions, or weaken the reasons on which they are founded. If you are not to look to the Common Law for the persons who are to take the inheritance, because it is abrogated by the Statute, you cannot look to it for the portions of the inheritance to which they are entitled, for the same reason. The Statute would be truly imperfect, if it has not provided for both. If the Common Law is to be resorted to for the latter, and thereby to fix the amount of the portion, the principle is to be let in, that the lineal descendants, in infinitum, of any person deceased, shall represent their ancestor. The character of the Statute would be essentially changed, its regard to natural affection, and preference for the next of kin to the intestate, would be overruled by the Common Law, to which its essential provisions are repugnant. That the eighteenth section of our Act, which declares that it shall be no bar to a party, that any ancestor, through whom he derives his descent from the intestate, is, or hath been an alien, is a recognition of the existence of the Common Law of Descents, I think, is equally unfounded. The Common Law in regard to aliens, was no part of the Common Law of Descents. It was founded on an entirely different policy, a policy repugnant to the spirit of our institutions, and to our Act of Descents, which regards natural affection, wherever the object of it may be, and was required to be abrogated by our Statute, as being in conflict with its spirit and principles. In every point of view, both upon reason and authority, I think the Common Law of Descents has been abrogated by our Statute, and that it cannot be resorted to, to supply any supposed defects in 440 it. But, if it were not, *I think it will be found, on an examination of the Statute, that there will be as little difficulty in finding a provision for the case before us, by a sound construction of it, as in the cases referred to. Its first section professes to provide a course of descents in all cases to arise in future. It enacts, that henceforth, when any person having title to any real estate of inheritance, shall die intestate as to such estate, it shall descend, and pass in parcenary to his kindred, male and female, in the following course, &c. The fourth section, explained by the sixteenth section, provides for the case before us. Anthony Gardner, whose estate is to be distributed, died intestate, leaving neither children, nor their descendants, nor father, nor mother, nor brother, nor sister, but leaving descendants of a brother and sister. The fourth section declares, that if there be no father, (to whom the third section gives the estate, where there are no children, or their descendants,) then to his mother, brothers and sisters, and their descendants, or such of them as there be. The descendants of the brother and sister of Anthony Gardner, at the time of his death, were, one niece on the part of his brother, two nephews on the part of his sister, and the children of two deceased nieces on the part of the sister. These are called to the inheritance by the fourth section, it must be admitted. A due regard is paid by it to natural affection; for they, the niece and nephews, were the next of kin to Anthony Gardner, at the time of his death, and next to them, the children of his two nieces, who have died. Standing on the fourth section alone, it might be insisted, (on a literal construction of it,) that, as the children of the deceased nieces were descendants of the sister of the intestate, they would be entitled to an equal portion of the inheritance with the living niece, and nephews, though they are not in the same degree of kindred with them to the intestate. In such case, the preference for the next of kin would be lost sight of: but, giving due weight to that preference, it might be plausibly insisted on, that, though

441 they are descendants *of the sister of the intestate, they are by one degree not so near of kin to the intestate as his niece and two nephews, and though entitled to take a portion of the inheritance by the words of the fourth section, are entitled only to the shares of their mothers, who were in the same degree of kindred to the intestate, with the living niece and nephews, not jure representationis, but in suo proprio jure, by force of the principle alluded to. But, the sixteenth section, I think, clears up this difficulty. Taking it in reference to the four first sections of the Act, and it impliedly provides for the case before us. The first section, as was said by Judge Tucker, in the case of Templeman v. Steptoe, professes to provide for every case. The words of it are: "Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That henceforth, where any person having title to any real estate of inheritance shall die intestate as to such estate, it shall descend and pass in parcenary to his kindred, male and female, in the following course," &c. The second section gives the estate to his children, or their descendants, if any there be: the third section, if there be no children nor their descendants, gives it to the father: the fourth section, if there be no father, then to his mother, brothers, and sisters, and their descendants, or such of them as there be. All these sections follow the current of natural affection, and strongly indicate the preference for the next of kin to the intestate. The sixteenth section fixes the portion of all, by specific examples, which contain the principle to be applied. It begins with the copulative. "And where the children of the intestate," (the first class; plainly referring to the second section, in which provision is made for children,) "or his mother, brothers, and sisters," (the second class; provided for in the fourth section, passing the third, in which the father is provided for) "or his grand-mother, uncles and aunts," (third class,) &c. come into the partition, they shall take per capita; that is to say, by persons, and where a part of them

442 being dead, and a part living, *the issue of those dead having right to partition, such issue shall take per stirpes, or by stocks; that is to say, the shares of their deceased parents. If, then, in the case before us, either the brother or sister of Anthony Gardner had been alive at his death, and the other dead, leaving children, it is clear, the children would have taken the share of their deceased parent, equally to be divided among them; because, according to common intent, which is common sense, where an estate devolves on more persons than one, and the portions are not designated, they take equal shares, as is said by Mr. Pendleton in Browne v. Turberville, not by the Common Law, the jure representationis, but by force of the Statute in jure suo proprio. In all of the examples put by this section, whenever one of the stocks of the nearest kindred is alive, and some dead, the descendants of those dead take per stirpes, that is, the shares of their parents by force of the Statute, and not jure representationis by the Common Law; for, if they did, in the cases of remote kindred, if you mount up to the stock by that principle of the Common Law, you defeat the preference for the next of kin, which is to be found in the Statute: as in the case before us, if you look to the brother and sister of the intestate (where both were dead at the time of his death) and consider them as alive, you would defeat the principle of preference for the next of kin, by dividing the inheritance equally among their descendants where some of them are one degree more remote than the others, by giving one-half of the inheritance to the Appellant, the niece of the intestate, to the injury of the two nephews, in equal degree of kindred to the intestate, and that for the purpose of giving larger portions to the children of the dead nieces (who are one degree more remote) than they would otherwise be entitled to. If in the cases expressly provided for by the sixteenth section, as where some of the children of the intestate are dead, and some living, or where some of his brothers and sisters are dead, and some living, the children of those dead are

443 to take *per stirpes, the shares of the deceased parents, why should not the children of deceased nieces, in the case before us, be confined to the shares of their deceased parents according to the principle applicable to children, and brothers and sisters when some are alive, and some dead, leaving children? No possible reason can be assigned for it, but that they are not expressly provided for in the sixteenth section. But this was unnecessary, if it were possible to provide for every case. It was enough, that while the Statute professes to provide for every case in its first section, it furnishes a principle applicable to all which are not expressly provided for. When all of a class are alive, they take per capita, by persons; and when some are alive, and some dead, leaving children, the latter take per stirpes, the shares of their deceased parents: in relation to each other, they take equal shares, being in equal degree of kindred to the intestate; but, in relation to those of the class who are alive, and stand in one degree of kindred nearer to the intestate, they take unequal share, where the deceased parent leaves more than one child, as in the case before us, the niece and nephew alive at the death of the intestate, and standing in equal degree of kindred to him, take equal shares of the inheritance, and the children of the deceased nieces, representing their dead parents, take their shares equally among them per stirpes, but standing in one degree more remote from the intestate, take unequal shares in relation to the shares of the living niece (the Appellant) and of the two nephews.

This construction of the Statute is not so violent as in the cases cited. If in any of the cases not expressly provided for by the Statute, we can get a principle applicable to the cases expressly provided for, we are at liberty to apply it to cases not expressly provided for.

On this construction of the Statute, I think the Decree is correct, and ought to be affirmed.

Administrator—Release of Sureties—Retention of Property by Administrator in Another Capacity.—If an Administratrix settles her accounts as such, in which a balance is found due to the estate of the intestate, and then she qualifies as guardian of the infant children of the intestate, and receives their distributive shares into her hands, the sureties in the Administration Bond are absolved from Administrators—Release of Surety—Retention of Property in Another Capacity—Election.—The law is well settled that, where an executor or administrator having assets in his hands, becomes the guardian of the legatee or distributee, he may elect to hold the share of such legatee or distributee in his character as guardian; and thus while he charges his sureties in the guardian bond, he exonerates those in the administration bond. And it is equally well settled, that in order thus to shift the responsibility from one class of sureties to the other, some distinct act or declaration is necessary on the part of the executor or administrator, indicative of his intention to hold the fund in his character of guardian. Smith v. Gregory, 26 Gratt. 257, citing the principal case to sustain the point. In Harvey v. Steptoe, 17 Gratt. 300, it is said: "When the same person is the representative of two estates, one of which is debtor to the other, or when the same person is representative of an estate and guardian of a legatee, the time at which the transfer of assets should be made will depend upon the condition of the debtor estate, and the state of the administration. Accordingly, in such a case, the court will not shift the responsibility from one set of sureties to the other, without some act or declaration on the part of the representative indicating an intention to transfer the assets." Morrow v. Peyton, 8 Leigh 54; Myers v. Wade, 6 Rand. 444."

To the same effect, the principal case is cited in note to Alston v. Munford, 1 Fed. Cas. 592; Morrow v. Peyton, 8 Leigh 75; Smith v. Gregory, 26 Gratt. 259; Perry v. Campbell, 10 W. Va. 228. And in Board v. Cain, 28 W. Va. 770, it is said: "A fiduciary cannot transfer his mere indebtedness in one capacity to himself in another capacity, so as to exonerate his securities in the one and throw the burden upon his securities in the other. To make the transfer valid, it must consist of something more than a naked liability: it must be substantial assets. If made by an insolvent fiduciary. (Smith v. Gregory, 26 Gratt. 218; Phillips v. Manning, 14 Eng. Ch'y R. 309, 315). But if the fiduciary is solvent and able to pay over the funds, all that is necessary is for him, when he is ordered to pay it over, or when the law would authorize him to pay it over to a third person holding the other fiduciary character, to make his election and manifest it by some act, direction or admission." (Swope v. Chambers, 2 Gratt. 319; Myers v. Wade, 6 Rand. 444; Broadus v. Rosson, 3 Leigh 12; Morrow v. Peyton, 8 Leigh 54; Pifer's Estate, 15 Pa. St. 533; Gottsberger

Guardian and Ward—Education of Ward—Application of Principal of Estate to.—A Guardian cannot apply any part of the principal of the infant's estate to his education or maintenance, without the previous consent of the Court appointing the Guardian, according to the provisions of the 26th section of the Act concerning Guardians.

Same—Same—Parent as Guardian.—A parent who is guardian of his children, is more bound than others to a strict observance of this rule; for there is a natural, if not a legal obligation on all parents to support their children, if of ability to do so. By GREEN, J.

Same—Same—Deficit during First Years Set-Off by Surplus in Later Years.—If the expense of maintaining and educating infant wards, exceeds their annual income, until they become of an age to render service, (say fourteen, fifteen, or sixteen years,) and if, when they arrive to that age, their services are equal to their support: the surplus of expenditure during the former period, ought to be set-off against the income of their estates during the latter period, till they arrive to the age of twenty-one years.

This was an appeal from a Decree from the Chancery Court of Winchester. The Complainants were John Wade, and Hannah his wife, who was Hannah Myers, Joseph Purcell, and Susan his wife, who was Susan Myers, and Thomas Myers, and John Myers. They state in their Bill, that Benjamin Myers, late of Loudoun, died intestate, leaving considerable personal estate, and leaving as his representatives, his widow, Elizabeth Myers, and eight children, viz: Elizabeth, a daughter who attained her age, and died intestate, Benjamin, a son who died an infant intestate, Thomas and John, two of the Plaintiffs, Hannah and Susan, two other Plaintiffs, Isaac, who lives out of the State, and Sarah, now the wife of Joseph Hansborough: That Elizabeth, the widow, administered on the estate, and Israel Janney, and James Moore, were her securities: that in 1798, an ex parte settlement of her Administration account took place, which is annexed to the Bill, and the Plaintiffs say, that although there are inaccuracies in it to their detriment, they are willing to receive their respective distributary shares of it, adding thereto the parts of the deceased brother and sister, Elizabeth and Benjamin. The Administration account shows a balance due from the Administratrix of 1130l. 10 9/4, which, after deducting one-third for the widow's share, leaves 753l. 16 10 1/2, to be distributed amongst the eight children.

The Plaintiffs further show, that at the time of the settlement they were infants, and the widow then became their Guardian, and Joseph Lewis, jr. and Samuel Hough were her securities.

They say, that no part of their father's estate has been paid to them by the widow, either as Administratrix, or Guardian; they claim their respective shares, and make Guardian and Ward—Support of Ward—Application of Principal of Estate to.—This subject is discussed at some length in monographic note on "Guardian and Ward" appended to Barnum v. Frost, 17 Gratt. 398, which see.

The principal case is cited to the point in Broadus v. Rosson, 3 Leigh 35; Garrett v. Carr, 1 Rob. 309; Harcum v. Hudnall, 14 Gratt. 578; foot-note to Rinker v. Strett, 33 Gratt. 663; Brown v. Grant, 29 W. Va. 118, 11 S. E. Rep. 900.

the widow, in both characters, and the two sets of sureties, and the two surviving children, Sarah and Isaac, parties to their Bill.

The widow answered, relying on the settlement of her Administration account, and admits that she then became the Guardian, and gave the bond and security mentioned in the Bill. She denies, that she owes a penny to either of the Plaintiffs, and avers that she laid out on them, for their support, dress, education, and genteel living, a great deal more than their respective shares of their father's estate amounted to: thus, she furnished to Hannah board, clothing, and tuition, from Sept. 1795, when her father died, to May, 1804, which was worth at least $100 per annum; and board and clothing from 1804, to 1809, when she married, which were worth, after making her a liberal allowance for her services, at least $60 a year, and on her marriage, supplied her with furniture worth $50, making an aggregate of $1,216 66, which she claims with interest: in the same way, she charges to Susan $1,159 50, with interest from 1808, when she married: to Thomas $1,000, for ten years board, clothing, and tuition, with interest from 1805, when he left her, at the age of seventeen: and to John $960 with interest.

446 *As to the Plaintiffs' share of the deceased children, Benjamin and Elizabeth, the whole of their shares were laid out on them; and that at Elizabeth's death, certain monies were left in the hands of Mr. S. Carr, which the Plaintiffs themselves agreed might be put out on interest for the support of the Defendant; if the Plaintiffs thought themselves entitled to it, they would have claimed it at that time.

The Defendant described, in feeling terms, her present impoverished and afflicted condition, and the ingratitude of her four children, who, in return for her kindness, and the sacrifices she had made to promote their welfare and happiness, were now endeavoring to bring her grey hairs with sorrow to the grave.

The Defendants Janney and Moore, the sureties in the Administration Bond, demurred to the Bill, but on that being overruled by the Court, Moore answered, relying on their being released when on the settlement, the widow was appointed Guardian, and gave security, as such.

The Defendants Lewis and Hough, the sureties in the Guardian's Bond, in their Answers, relied on the fact, that the widow had brought up her children in a genteel manner, and had in so doing, necessarily expended greatly more than their respective distributive shares of their father's estate.

The accounts between the parties were referred to Commissioners several times. They were stated in both ways. In the account in which the widow was credited by the education, clothing, and board of the children, these latter were brought largely in debt: but, in the account in which these credits were not allowed, the widow, as Guardian, was brought considerably in debt.

The Chancellor dismissed the Bill as to the Defendants Janney and Moore, the securities in the Administration Bond, but disallowing the claim of the Guardian to expend any part of the principal of her Wards' estate towards their education, clothing and maintenance, decreed that the Guardian and her securities, Lewis and Hough, should pay to the Plaintiffs the sum reported to be due to them, with 447 interest *to the daughters, from the time they arrived to the age of eighteen years, and to the sons from the time they arrived to the age of twenty-one years. Adopting this rule, he decreed to Purcell and wife, $375 26, with interest from 8th December, 1802; to Wade and Wife, $379 76, with interest from 18th May, 1804; to Thomas Myers, $403 76, with interest from 15th April, 1809; and to John Myers, $403 76, with interest from 27th March, 1811. From which Decree, the Guardian and her securities appealed.

May 15. The Judges delivered their opinions.*

JUDGE GREEN.

The Chancellor properly held in this case, that the sureties for the Guardianship, and not those for the Administration, were responsible. Mrs. Myers' admission, in her Answer, that upon qualifying as Guardian, she received the estates of the infants into her hands, though not conclusive, is prima facie evidence against her sureties, and is not contradicted. She was not Guardian for John, and consequently, her sureties are not responsible for his share of his father's estate in her hands, and as to this part of the subject, the Bill should have been dismissed; but, if there were no other objection to the Decree, it should not be reversed on that account, since nothing is decreed to him.

A Guardian cannot, under any circumstances, justify the application of any part of the principal of an infant's estate to his education or maintenance, without the previous sanction of the proper Court.

448 This is the spirit of our *Statute, and indeed its express letter. If there is any difference in this respect, between a stranger and a parent acting as Guardian, the rule should be enforced with more rigor against the latter than the former; for there is a natural, if not a legal obligation, on all parents to support their children, if of ability to do so. The case of Johnson and Wife v. Holiday, in this Court, not reported, is a very strong case to this point. Although after the children grew up, their services appear to have been equal to their support, yet the expense of maintaining and educating them up to that time, far exceeded the annual income of their estates. And, I think the surplus of expenditure during that period, ought to be set-off against the income of their estates after their services were equivalent to their support, until they came to the age of twenty-one years. Our Statute allows the excess of expenditure in one year, to be set-off against the income of the next.

*Absent, JUDGES CABELL and CARR, the latter of whom had rendered the Decree of the Court below, and therefore did not sit in the case.

This rule has been applied by the Decree to the two sons who are Plaintiffs, but not to the daughters who are Plaintiffs, although there were much stronger reasons for applying it to the latter than to the former, they having lived with their mother until their ages of twenty-three, whilst the sons left her at their ages of seventeen. The Administrator of Elizabeth is a party in another character, and as he will be barred by the Decree from claiming hereafter as Administrator, there is no occasion to have him made a party in form in that character. Nor is it necessary that there should be an Administration on the estate of Benjamin, or that any security should be demanded of the Plaintiffs, for refunding in any event what they receive on account of his share of the estate, since he died an infant, and an apprentice, and could owe no debts. The Decree should be reversed.

JUDGE COALTER.

The intestate, Benjamin Myers, died in 1795, leaving a widow and eight children; the eldest child about seventeen 449 *years of age, and the youngest about three. In September, 1795, his widow took administration, and gave bond and security.

At some period or other, but when does not appear, she settled her Administration and counts; the latest date in which account is in July 1798.

In April, 1799, she became Guardian of seven of the children, the eldest son, Isaac, having attained his age of twenty-one about that time. The next eldest child, Elizabeth, was then about nineteen years of age, and the next one to her, Benjamin, about sixteen or seventeen. It is stated in the Bill, and not denied, that Elizabeth attained her age and died, and that Benjamin died under age. Susannah, now the wife of Joseph Purcell, was about eleven years of age when her father died, and about fifteen when her mother became Guardian. Hannah, now the wife of John Wade, was about nine years old at the death of her father, and about thirteen when her mother undertook as her Guardian. Thomas was about seven at the death of his father, and about eleven when she became Guardian. John was about five when his father died, and about nine when his mother became Guardian, and Sarah, now the wife of Joseph Hansborough, was about three at the death of her father, and about seven when her mother became Guardian.

The dividend of the estate coming to each child, was about three hundred and fourteen dollars.

Joseph Purcell took administration on the estate of Elizabeth, and gave bond in December, 1812; she was born in 1780, so that she was probably about thirty-two years of age when she died. It is not alleged in the answer that she had received her share of the estate; the allegation being, that all had been expended in maintaining and educating. It seems, however, that she asserted no claim during her life against her mother. On the contrary, it is in proof, that when on her death-bed, she said she had some money out in the hands of S. Carr, of which, she intended the 450 *landlord of the house then leased by her mother should be paid his rent, and after payment of her debts, she intended the residue for her mother. She made no Will though, and Carr paid the money, about $270, after payment of debts, to Purcell, as her Administrator, about which time Joseph Purcell, Thomas Myers, and Sarah, now Mrs. Hansborough, stated that Purcell and Wade talked of claiming the estate of Elizabeth. But Thomas and Sarah proposed to give it up to their mother, if Purcell and Wade would agree to it; but they said, as they had got nothing, or expected nothing from the estate of Benjamin Myers, they considered it but right to receive what was coming from Elizabeth's estate.

It seems that Myers, the mother, kept the family together, raised and educated them reputably; that she was industrious and careful, keeping a tavern and boarding-house, devoted herself to her children, and but for the misfortune of losing her house by fire, would probably have been now solvent, and able to give them something. From age and misfortune, however, she ultimately became paralytic and insolvent; after which, to wit, in 1815, this suit is instituted by Purcell and wife, Wade and wife, and Thomas and John, against the widow and her securities, as Administratrix and Guardian, claiming in settlement of the Administration and Guardian's accounts, or rather, of the latter as they are willing to abide by the settlement that had been made of the Administration account, stating her insolvency, and claiming to have from the securities, their shares of the estate, and of the portions of Elizabeth and Benjamin, Decreed to them. Isaac Myers, the eldest son, had removed from the State. He is made a Defendant, but is not regularly before the Court. He was about thirty-seven years of age though, when the suit was brought, and has never made any claim. Sarah, the wife of Hansborough, was about twenty-three years old when the suit was brought; she would not join in it, and in the Answer of herself and husband, they disclaim 451 any interest in it. *Susannah married Purcell at about twenty-four years of age, having resided with her mother until that time, and was about thirty-one years of age when the suit was instituted. Hannah married Wade at about the age of twenty-three, having also resided with her mother, and was about twenty-nine years of age when the suit was brought. Thomas was about twenty-seven years old when the suit was brought, and John about twenty-five. When the widow became Administratrix, many of the children were of tender years, three of them females, one of fifteen, one of eleven, and one of nine. They were kept together, and of course supported by their mother, until she became Guardian, a space of about four years. Their interest in the estate would not yield more than about $19 per annum, a sum entirely inadequate to their support and education. Had the widowed mother possessed an estate sufficient for their maintenance and education, although I am not prepared to say that she would have been bound to expend it in that way, yet had she thought proper to do so, it would have been a voluntary donation, in no wise a bar to their future claim to their own estate. This though, was not her condition, and the only alternative was, by an industrious and frugal application of the whole fund to their general support, and the education of the young, to keep the family together; or, to throw them on the parish, and have them hired out by the Overseers of the Poor. In obedience to the promptings of the maternal bosom, or, as she says in her Answer, to the request of her husband, she pursued the former course. She administered the estate, and settled up the accounts in the course of the first four years, and then became Guardian, without having received any allowance in the account so settled, for her expenditures on the family, although two of the female children had then only arrived at an age barely fit to be bound out, a third being only about seven, and her son John about nine, both of course without education, and entirely unfit to leave the maternal home, if that could possibly be 452 avoided. *She then became Guardian; and in strict Law, ought to have reported the condition of her children to the Court, and had them all bound out by the Overseers of the Poor, except Isaac, who had just attained his age of twenty-one years. Her eldest daughter, Elizabeth, was then about nineteen. She continued to enjoy the protection of the maternal roof, until her death, at the age of about thirty-two years. She might, when she came of age, have received her portion, had her mother been able, as probably she then was, to pay it, and sought her fortune elsewhere. It was inadequate though, to her support, and she must have hired herself out for that purpose. She elected to remain with her mother, and doubtless to apply much of her labor to her own earnings, and to acquire some little property, leaving it to her mother to expend her little portion of the common stock, to keep her little sisters and brothers at school, until the latter were fit to be bound out, and to keep the former from the possible pollution of common servitude until they arrived at age, and were finally married. This she must have seen and known was the manner in which her portion of the estate was used, and this she approved of. She never made any claim on her mother therefor, but the reverse. She wished her even to get the profits of her own earnings. She could make, and had a right to make, a proper estimate of her own security, ease and comfort, in her mother's house, in the society of those dear to her, and she did make that proper estimate. She had the care and watchfulness of a mother during her whole life, and during her last illness; whether that was long or short, does not appear, but she was grateful for it, and I think we are bound to believe, that had she survived until this suit was brought, she never would have joined in it, to disturb the last days of that afflicted mother. She would have been at that time thirty-five years of age, fourteen years beyond her minority. Her Administrator, if he is to be considered before the Court, never made any claim on this score, until 453 three years after *her death. I think she has made a good and wise distribution of her portion of the estate, which neither she, if she was alive, nor any person claiming under her, ought to be permitted to disturb. The other daughters too, had the protection and tender care of a mother, the decent apparel and upraising in a reputable boarding-house, and continued to enjoy these advantages until they were settled in life, several years after they were of full age, without complaint or demand. When they attained their age, had they asked for that pittance, which had thus been expended on them, they might possibly have received it, and gone to some kind of service elsewhere. This they wisely forebore to do; and not until ten years thereafter in the one case, and eight in the other, is this claim made by their husbands, of a mother borne down by the visitations of Providence, when, as she says in her Answer, they may suppose her incapable of defending herself.

Surely, it seems to me, they had a right to sanction these proceedings in their mother towards them, evidently so beneficial to them. This, they and their husbands have done, as it seems to me, not only by their long silence and acquiescence, but by their express declarations, except in the case of John, who does not seem to have been present on the consultation, whether their mother should have Elizabeth's property, agreeably to her dying wish. Thomas was about twenty-four years of age when he made these declarations. He and John were probably bound out at their age of seventeen, but John was quite young when his father died, and for a long time not in a condition to be bound out. But, even he acquiesces for four years after he came of age. They all knew the meritorious exertions of their mother in their favor, and that there was no possible way of keeping the family together, and raising them in the credit in which they were raised, except the one adopted; and no doubt these considerations operated on their consciences to produce the acquiescence and abandonment of their claim, at least so long as their mother was in health and in some degree of prosperity.

454 *Although, therefore, I approve of the Law as, in general, an excellent provision in the case of infants not having estate sufficient to support them; yet, as the estate was not wasted, but probably applied as their father intended, I can see nothing in that Law to prevent those interested, when they come of age, to approve and sanction a departure from it, which must have tended, as in this case it seems to me it did, especially in the case of the females, so much to the general advantage of the whole family. This, too, in the view very properly taken of it by the youngest daughter. On these grounds, I think, the Bill ought to have been dismissed. But, there can be no pretext, as it seems to me, to give them the share of Elizabeth, or to charge interest in the case of the daughters, from their age of eighteen, instead of twenty-one. The interest of their estate, until that age, had they then sued for it, would surely have been allowed for their maintenance and education. If the Bill is not to be dismissed, the Account and Decree ought to be reformed in these particulars. It is not a case in which the Court ought to go to one cent beyond what the Law imperiously demanded. Had the suit been brought in due time, these securities might have had some indemnity from the estate of the mother. It is delayed until that fails, and that the Appellees are entitled to no more than sheer Law.

The PRESIDENT.

If the application for relief was to the equity of the Court, I should not incline to afford it upon the facts in this case, but the Plaintiffs rely on their legal rights, which they have never relinquished, and come into the Court of Chancery, because, in the state of the parties, the whole controversy could not be settled in a Court of Law, and for the settlement of the accounts of the Defendant, Elizabeth Myers, both as Administratrix and Guardian. As to the former, there is now no controversy, it having been admitted by the parties to have been correctly settled. As to 455 *the latter, her account as Guardian, she admits, in her Answer, that when she qualified as such, she received the estate into her hands in that capacity, but she insists, that the Plaintiffs have no claim against her, as the whole of it was expended on their maintenance, and some small advancements. For the latter, she has credit. By the 26th section of the Act concerning Guardians, her defence as to the former is forbidden. Under that section, whatever might be her motives, she could expend no part of the principal of the estate on the maintenance of her Wards, without the approbation of the Court. Such a defence could not be made at Law, and to allow it in a Court of Equity, would be to repeal the Statute. Beyond the interest upon the principal estate, she was not at liberty to go. The Decree was therefore correct in disallowing any credit for the principal so expended; but, as she might expend the interest on the maintenance of her Wards, it is erroneous is not allowing her a credit to that amount, until her Wards respectively attained the age of twenty-one years. It is, therefore, to be reversed, and the Decree agreed upon by a majority of the Court entered.

Decree of the Court.

The Court is of opinion, that the said Decree is correct in disallowing any credit for the principal expended by the Appellant, Elizabeth Myers, in the maintenance of her Wards; but the same is erroneous in charging her with any interest before her Wards attained the age of twenty-one years; therefore, it is Decreed and Ordered, that the said Decree be reversed and annulled, and that the Appellees do pay unto the Appellants, their costs by them expended in the prosecution of their Appeal aforesaid, here. And this Court proceeding to pronounce such Decree as the said Chancery Court ought to have pronounced, it is further Decreed and Ordered, that the Appellant, Elizabeth Myers, who was Guardian of the Appellees, Hannah 456 Wade, *Susan Purcell, Thomas Myers and John Myers, and the Appellants, Lewis and Hough, her securities, do pay unto the Appellee, John Wade, in right of his wife Hannah, the sum of three hundred and seventy-nine dollars and seventy-six and a half cents, with interest thereon at the rate of six per centum per annum, from the eighteenth day of May, eighteen hundred and seven, (when she arrived at the age of twenty-one years,) till paid; to the Appellee, Joseph Purcell, in right of his wife, Susan, the sum of three hundred and seventy-five dollars, and twenty-six and a half cents, with like interest thereon from the eighth day of December, eighteen hundred and five, (when she arrived at the age of twenty-one years,) till paid; to the Appellee, Thomas Myers, the sum of four hundred and three dollars and seventy-six and a half cents, with like interest thereon from the fifteenth day of April, eighteen hundred and nine, (when he arrived at the age of twenty-one years,) till paid; to the Appellee, John Myers, the sum of four hundred and three dollars and seventy-six and a half cents, with like interest thereon from the twenty-seventh day of March, eighteen hundred and eleven, (when he arrived at the age of twenty-one years,) till paid: And also, that the Appellants do pay unto the Appellees, their costs by them in the said Chancery Court expended.

Trover*—Action of—Waiver of Trespass.—If a plaintiff bring Trover or Detinue, to recover a horse, and Trespass, for taking the same horse, a Judgment for the Defendant in the Action of Trover or Detinue, is a good bar to the Action of Trespass; for, by bringing Trover or Detinue, he waives the Trespass.

Same—Trespass—Damages Recoverable in Each.—In Trespass, he might have recovered damages, not only for the force and violence, but for the value of the horse; but, having elected to sue for the horse only, or its value, he is bound by his election.

Pleading and Practice—One Cause of Action—Two Suits.—Case at Bar.—A Plaintiff cannot be allowed to sever one cause of action, and carve two suits out of it; therefore, if the Trespass consists in the Defendant's stopping the Plaintiff's wagon and team, and taking by force from the team a horse claimed by the Defendant, the Plaintiff might in Trespass recover damages for the injury in stopping his team, delaying him &c., as well as the value of the horse taken; but, if he elects to bring Trover for the horse taken, he cannot maintain Trespass for stopping the team &c. for it was one act.

in Trespass, which does not allege that the plaintiff has property in the thing taken, is bad on demurrer.

Same Case at Bar.—If a Declaration in Trespass charges the Defendant with taking a horse from the Plaintiff's possession, but not his property, and with stopping his waggon and team, the residue of the horses being the Plaintiff's property, a plea, which avers that this horse was geared with the others, that the Plaintiff's waggoner (the Plaintiff not being present) endeavoured to carry off the Defendant's said horse, by driving his team violently, and that the Defendant stopped the team to retake his horse, using no more force than was necessary for that purpose, is a good plea, the Defendant being justifiable in thus stopping the team for that purpose.

The statement of the case, as exhibited by the Record, is so fully set forth by the Judge who delivered the opinion of the Court, that it is unnecessary to present it here.

The case was argued by Stanard for the Appellant. There was no Counsel for the Appellee.

May 28. JUDGE COALTER.*

This is an action of Trespass, instituted by James Long, against Isaac Hite, in the Superior Court of Law for Frederick County, on the 31st July, 1818.

458 *The first Declaration filed in the cause (at October Rules, 1818,) is for this: that the said Hite, with force and arms, stopped, in the highway, a waggon and team belonging to the Plaintiff, and then in his possession, and took therefrom one of the horses belonging to the team of the Plaintiff, in possession of the Plaintiff, and the property of the Plaintiff, of the value of $200, and converted him to his own use, and other wrongs, &c. to the Plaintiff did, against the peace of the Commonwealth.

At May Term, 1819, the office Judgment was set aside, and the Defendant pleaded not guilty, and issue was taken thereon, and leave was given him to file additional pleas, and the cause was continued.

The Record then proceeds to state, that the Defendant filed the following pleas, to wit: First, that the horse in the Declaration alleged to have been taken from the team of the Plaintiff, was the property of the Defendant, wherefore he took him peaceably, and without force from the said team, which is the same trespass in the Declaration supposed, and traverses that he committed any other trespass, or used any force in taking the horse. Secondly, that on the day, &c., a waggoner, whose name then was, and yet is unknown to the Defendant, was then and there driving the supposed waggon of the Plaintiff, and had the horse in the Declaration mentioned, of the property of the Defendant, without his consent, and against his will, geared and harnessed to the waggon, and driving him therein, whereupon the Defendant demanded the horse, he the Defendant having the right of property, and the right of possession, which was refused, and the waggoner forcibly and with great speed, drove the said waggon, in order to prevent the Defendant from re-taking the said horse, and to prevent his being carried off, and to re-gain his horse, the Defendant gently laid his hands upon the horses in the waggon, and peaceably took the said horse, being his own property, &c.

Then follows this plea: And the said Defendant, to the original Declaration in this cause, and for plea since the 459 *last continuance, says, that heretofore, to wit, on the 31st July, 1818, the Plaintiff sued out his Capias in Trover for a certain horse, against the Defendant in the Superior Court, &c., wherein it was so proceeded, that at the last Term, &c., there was a Judgment for the Defendant, and that the horse in the said action of Trover claimed, and the horse in the said original Declaration, are one and the same, and not different, &c. To this plea the Plaintiff demurred, alleging for cause, that the action of Trover was different for the subject matter of this suit: there the Plaintiff sought to recover the value of the horse; in this suit he seeks to recover damages for a trespass.

All this seems to have been done at the May Term, 1819. The other pleas (except that of not guilty,) seem to have stood without issue, either in fact, or law, being taken on them.

At May Term, 1820, the cause came on, upon the demurrer to the Plea, and Judgment on it was given for the Plaintiff. Whereupon, the Plaintiff moved the Court for leave to amend his Declaration, by adding a new count. This was objected to by the Defendant, because if the Declaration was defective, Judgment on the demurrer ought to be against the Plaintiff, and if not defective, leave to amend ought not to be given, as he had no right to make out a new case: also, because the Defendant did not ask leave to amend his plea, and because a Judgment stood against him on one plea, and there was an issue made up on another plea to the Declaration in its original form. But the Court permitted the Plaintiff to amend, because the amendment sought by the Plaintiff was not to make out a new case; not because the present Declaration was defective in point of Law, but because the Plaintiff wished to state the same cause of action more fully, distinctly, and at large, to enable the Jury more clearly, and correctly to understand the nature of the injury complained of. The amended Declaration was then filed.

It is a complete Declaration, though possibly is only to be considered a second count to the first Declaration, as 460 *neither that Declaration, nor the pleadings thereon, were withdrawn. This Count, or Declaration, charges that the Defendant, with force and arms, seized, and took from the waggon of the Plaintiff, a horse, then and there in possession of the Plaintiff, of great value, say $300, and converted and disposed of him to his own use, and also for this, that the Defendant, with force and arms, &c., and aided by a troop of his negroes, &c., whilst the Plaintiff's waggon and team were peaceably travelling on the highway, &c., did forcibly take from the team of the Plaintiff, a bay horse, then and there in the use and possession of the Plaintiff, and employed in drawing his waggon, &c., whereby the waggon and team of the Plaintiff, were detained in the public highway, and interrupted in the prosecution of their trip, &c., and the Plaintiff subjected to great trouble and expense, and loss.

At October Term, 1820, the cause was continued; at May Term, 1821, it appearing to the Court that the amended Declaration was filed before the last Term, and the Defendant not having entered any plea, it was ordered, that he plead on or before the tenth day of the Term. During this Term, the following proceedings were had. On motion of the Defendant, he has leave to withdraw his plea of not guilty, and by permission of the Court, filed a special plea, which is said to be in the words following: That on the day when the alleged trespass is supposed to have been committed, and for a long time before and after, the said horse in the Declaration set forth to have been taken by the Defendant, was, and continued to be the property of the Defendant, and was then, at &c., in the possession of a certain waggoner, whose name was, and yet is unknown to the Defendant, who had before that time, without the consent, and against the will of the Defendant, and against right, obtained and held the possession of the said horse, and refused to deliver him to the Defendant, though he lawfully and peaceably demanded him; and then and there violently drove the said waggon and horses, of purpose to eloin the said horse, wherefore 461 the Defendant, of "purpose to regain possession, then and there did lay his hands upon the horses in the said waggon, then and there being in possession of said waggoner, and did take him out of the said waggon, as he might lawfully do, &c., which is the same trespass, &c., without that, that he had no farther, or other force than was necessary to regain the possession of his property aforesaid, wherefore he prays Judgment, &c., without that, that the Plaintiff was in possession of said waggon, or said horse, or that the Defendant used force, as in the said count is supposed.

And for further plea, he says nearly as last above, except after alleging the horse to be his property, and in possession of the waggoner who was driving the team, he says, (the said Plaintiff then and there not being present,) and when he alleges that the horse was the property of the Defendant, he says, (and not the property of the said Plaintiff,) and so going on as in the other plea, and concludes, that in order to regain his said horse, he did lay his hands upon the horses in said waggon, without using any other or further force than was necessary, &c.

The Defendant also demurred to the Plaintiff's Declaration, for that it is double, and wants form.

The Plaintiff demurred to the first plea: 1. Because the matter therein stated, if true, is no justification of the trespass: 2. Because it might be given in evidence under the general issue, in mitigation of damages: 3. Because it is double, relying on the right of property, and the use only of such means as were necessary to recover possession. He also demurred to the second plea, for the same reasons.

The Plaintiff joined in the demurrer to the Declaration, but no joinders are stated in demurrer to the pleas.

At October Term, 1821, the Court overruled the demurrer to the Declaration, and sustained the demurrers to the pleas. The Defendant then pleaded not guilty, and the cause was continued.

At October Term, 1824, a Jury was sworn, well and truly to enquire of damages, who assessed damages to $500, but a motion being made for a new trial, the Plaintiff released one half of that sum, and Judgment was rendered for $250.

There was a Bill of Exceptions to two opinions of the Court, but which I consider unnecessary to notice, as it seems to me the case must be decided on other grounds; but, were it necessary, as at present advised, I think they were both erroneous.

The Judgment in the Action of Trover, decided the question as to the right of property in the horse, which was the main subject to controversy; but the Plaintiff seems to be of opinion, in which he was sustained by the Court, that although he brought his action of Trover to recover the value of the horse taken away, that he had a right also to bring Trespass to recover damages, as well for any violence, or breach of the peace, in taking that horse, as for the trespass in stopping the Plaintiff's team, in order to take him. These questions were decided on the demurrer first filed, and therefore the first question is, what Judgment ought to have been given on that demurrer?

The Declaration in this case, first filed, as above stated, covered the whole ground of complaint. Under it, the Plaintiff could recover as well the value of the horse taken away, as the damages sustained by stopping his team, &c. He elected though, also, to bring Trover, and the question is, whether that was not in Law a waiver of the whole trespass, as well that alleged to be committed in taking the horse, as in stopping the team, all being one act? A party is not precluded from bringing Trover, or Detinue, because the taking was violent. He may waive the trespass, and admit, as these actions do, that the property came lawfully into the possession of the Defendant, and this the Defendant cannot deny or traverse, so as to defeat the action, by showing that he took tortious possession. As to the horse taken away, I cannot perceive how the Plaintiff is to waive this trespass, so as to recover the value in

Trover, and maintain another action
463 for the trespass "so waived. If he can, the Defendant ought to be at liberty to plead, that he took it tortiously, in order that he may not be vexed by two suits for the same thing. It is laid down in 20 Vin. Abr. 540, tit. Trespass, and the cases there referred to, that the pendency of an action of Detinue, or Replevin for the same property, is a good plea to an action of Trespass. This would close the question, it seems to me, so far as to the trespass in taking away the horse, but, he also stopped the team of the plaintiff, of which this horse was one. It is all one act, though, and one cause of action. The party can go for the whole in Trespass, or he may elect to sue in Trover, or Detinue. I do not see how he can sever one cause of action, and carve two suits out of it. In his amended Declaration, he seeks to present this question more plainly and distinctly, by dropping his claim to property in the horse; but still goes for the violence and force in taking him, as well as for the trespass in stopping the team. Had the original Declaration been filed in this form, it would perhaps have shown a disclaimer of any property in the horse sued for in Trover; and therefore, I presume it was, that the Declaration retained its original form, until after that suit was decided. This, it seems to me, is a pretty apt commentary on this effort to split one cause of action into two: but, if the Declaration had been originally so filed, claiming merely to recover damages for a trespass supposed not to be waived by the other action, it seems to me that the plea would have been equally good. If it would not, it must be because the new count presented a different cause of action, and to which the former pleadings would be no answer, which would be contrary to the leave asked.

If the Plaintiff, instead of having Judgment entered on his demurrer, had moved to withdraw it, and to amend his Declaration, or to withdraw that Declaration and file a new one, and had filed the one now in the Record, the Defendant could have pleaded the action of Trover, and the other matters specially pleaded by him, and then there could have been no doubt, but that all these matters, if proper in defence, *would have availed him. The Plaintiff not having done this, (concerning the regularity of which I give no opinion,) but leaving the Judgment of the Court on the first demurrer to stand in force against the Defendant, we are necessarily to enquire, whether that Judgment was correct, or not. Thinking it was not, we must then do what that Court ought to have done, and no doubt would have done, (unless there had been a motion to withdraw the demurrer on the part of the Plaintiff,) that is, we must enter Judgment for the Defendant. But, if in this I am wrong, and if the case must be considered as standing on the new Declaration, and the pleadings to it, still I think Judgment must be given for the Defendant.

The first count in that Declaration, is for a trespass in taking a horse, not claimed in the Declaration to be the property of the Plaintiff. This is bad on the demurrer filed. 6 Bac. Abr. 600, tit. Trespass, I.

The second is trespass in stopping his team, and taking this horse, not claimed as the Plaintiff's property, from it, there being no dispute about the residue of the team, but that it belonged to the Plaintiff. The Defendant justifies by averring this horse to be his property; that he was geared in the team with the Plaintiff's horses, and that the waggoner, the Plaintiff not being present, endeavoured to carry him off by violently driving the team, &c.; and that he stopped the team, in order to re-take his horse, using no more force than was necessary for this purpose.

If he was justifiable in thus stopping the team for this purpose, (Bac. Abr. tit. Trespass, I.) as I think he was, it was a proper matter for a plea; and the matter so pleaded being confessed by the demurrer, Judgment must be for the Defendant.

The Judgment is therefore erroneous, and must be reversed, and entered for the Appellant, and that the Appellee take nothing by his Bill, &c.

JUDGES CARR, CABELL, and the PRESIDENT concurring, the Judgment was reversed.

465 *Cary Selden v. Benjamin James, Executor of R. Buchan.

May, 1828.

Sale of Land—Interest on Purchase Money—Excuse for Not Paying—Case at Bar.—The vendee of land, on a credit, to whom a Deed is made, and possession given, is not excused from paying interest on the purchase money, the payment of the principal having been delayed by a third party, who set up an adverse claim, (and commence a course of litigation, which continued for ten years, but which terminated in favor of the vendee's title,) the vendee having continued all that time in possession, and enjoyed the issues and profits.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—The vendor only covenanted to sell and convey a perfect title, (which was so conveyed, as proved by the result of the trial,) not that there should be no claimants, who would sue for it: he therefore committed no breach of his covenant, and this is no ground to excuse the vendee from paying interest.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—The trouble and expense of defending the suit, is what every one, who is sued, is exposed to, and the vendee's costs cannot be set off against the interest.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—To excuse the vendee from paying interest during the time that the adverse claim is in suit, it is not sufficient that he should be ready and willing to pay the principal: it ought also to appear clearly, that he did in fact keep the money useless and unproductive by him, and that he gave the vendee notice that it was so unproductive.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—Although the adverse claim in this case was by the Commonwealth, who proceeded to escheat the land by Inquisition, (which was opposed by the vendee by a Monstrans de Droit, who defeated the claim) the supposed seizin in Law into the hands of the Commonwealth by the office found, and the supposed liability of the vendee, to the Commonwealth, for the rents and profits, did not prevail over the actual seizin of the vendee, and as he actually enjoyed the issues and profits during the whole time, and by the result, became exempted from all liability for them to the Commonwealth, that supposed legal seizin of the Commonwealth, forms no excuse to the vendee for not paying the interest to the vendor.

Benjamin James, surviving Executor of Robert Buchan, filed his Bill in the Chancery Court of Fredericksburg, against Cary Selden, setting forth, that the said Buchan, by his Will, dated 1803, directed that his land should be sold, and that his Executors might sell on credit, if they could sell it on better terms, and that the money arising from the sale should be re-mitted to his two brothers: that the Testator died seised and possessed of a tract of land in Stafford; that the Plaintiff and J. M. Daniel proved the Will, qualified as Executors, and entered into the possession

466 *of the land: that they sold it at public auction, on the 20th March, 1804, on a credit of one and two years, to bear interest from the date, if not punctually paid, and Selden became the purchaser of 236 acres of it, at four pounds five shilling per acre, and immediately thereafter, paid $100 of the purchase money, entered into the possession of the land, and has retained possession of it ever since; that the Plaintiff and his Co-Executor executed a Deed to the said Selden, acknowledged it, and had it recorded: that Selden did not know of this at the time it was done, but being afterwards informed of it, approved of it, and claimed title to the land so conveyed: that shortly afterwards, an attempt was made, on behalf of the Commonwealth, to escheat the land, and an Inquisition of Escheat was returned to the District Court of Fredericksburg, and Selden filed a Monstrans de Droit, and Judgment was rendered in his favor by the District Court, which was affirmed by the Court of Appeals in 1816: that the Attorney General afterwards exhibited a Bill to the Chancery Court, claiming the purchase money in behalf of the Commonwealth, but the Bill was dismissed: that during these proceedings, Selden refused to pay the purchase money, or to give his bonds, but promised and agreed to pay the same when the case should be decided, and his title declared good: that after the decision in his favor, the Plaintiff applied to him to pay the purchase money with interest, and to execute the agreement; but he refuses to pay the interest, although the title has been decided in his favor, and he has constantly had the possession, and enjoyed the profits of the land. He therefore prays, that the Defendant may be compelled to execute the contract, and pay the balance of the purchase money, with interest on the instalments, as they become due, and that on failure thereof, before a short day, the land may be sold.

The Defendant, by his Answer, admitted the sale and purchase, as set out by the Bill: that before the sale, the Executors declared, that the lands were unincumbered, and *that a good and indefeasible title to them would be made: that he became the purchaser under the expectation that there would be no difficulty as to the title, and shortly afterwards entered into the possession of the land, and has retained it ever since: that he paid a part of the purchase money: that he knew nothing of the Deed till after it was executed and recorded: admits the proceedings on the part of the Commonwealth: he says, that pending those proceedings, he was advised it was not safe for him to pay the purchase money: that he was subjected, by the controversy, to considerable costs and expenses: that he was prevented, by the uncertainty of the title, from making such improvements in buildings, on the soil as he would have done, had the title been clear, as he believed it was, when he purchased: that he commenced building a barn and threshing machine, which he was obliged to abandon for the same cause; the materials rotted, and the labor was lost: that the Executors removed to distant parts in 1808, and although they left an agent, yet, if he had paid the money to him and had lost the land, he could not have recovered it back, without great trouble and costs: that he was at all times ready and willing to pay the purchase money after it became due, even pending the suit, upon being properly indemnified against the loss of the land: that he had every reason to believe, that if he had paid the money, the Executors would immediately remit the money to Scotland to the devisees, so that he would have been without indemnity: that there was no warranty in the Deed, nor any stipulation by the Executors to make any, and therefore, he thought himself not bound to pay the purchase money: that a few acres of the land conveyed to him are in the adverse possession of another person, and was so at the time of the sale and conveyance: for these reasons, he is advised that he is not bound to pay interest on the purchase money pending the controversy: that at all events, he is not bound to pay the interest from the day of sale, in default of paying the principal punctually: 468 that if he is decreed to pay any interest, he is entitled to a set-off for the costs and expenses incurred in defending the title; and that he ought only to pay for such part of the land as was in possession of the Testator, and to which he had a clear title.

The Chancellor, being of opinion that the Defendant was not responsible for the land in the adverse possession of another, nor for interest on the purchase money from the time of the sale, but that he is responsible for the interest from the respective periods when the instalments became due, decreed accordingly. The Defendant appealed.

Stanard, for the Appellant.

Daniel, and Leigh, for the Appellee.

May 28. JUDGE CARR.*

In the year 1803, Robert Buchan made his Will, by which he directed (among other things) that his Executors should sell his lands, &c. and remit the proceeds of sale to his brothers, David and James, residents of Scotland, to be equally divided between them.

This Will was admitted to Record in February, 1804, and in May following, the Executors sold the land, at public outcry, to the Appellant Selden. On the 10th July, 1805, they executed a Deed for the land, which was recorded on the 9th December, 1805. On the 10th December, 1805, an Inquest was held by the Escheator, and a Jury, and this land was escheated to the Commonwealth, for defect of heirs of Buchan. In May, 1806, Selden filed a Monstrans de Droit in the Fredericksburg District Court, claiming the land under the Will, the sale, and the Deed of the Executors, and praying Judgment. An issue was made up, a trial had, a special verdict found, and in October, 1806, a Judgment 469 on the verdict entered in *favor of Selden: from this Judgment an appeal was taken, and in April, 1816, the Judgment was affirmed by this Court. Selden took possession of the land in 1804, immediately after his purchase, and has not been removed from it for a moment, by these proceedings. The Bill now before us is filed by the surviving Executor, to compel a payment of the purchase money remaining due with interest, and in default of payment, to have a Decree for the sale of the land. The Answer admits the justice of the claim generally, but insists that under the particular circumstances, no interest ought to be paid. The Chancellor decreed that interest be paid from the dates when the different instalments became due, and ordered an account, and also a survey, the Answer having stated that a few acres within the bounds of the Deed, were at the time of the sale, and still continued in the adverse possession of another. The appeal is from this order.

The whole argument turned on the question of interest. In his Answer, Selden resists the payment of interest: 1st. Because he was assured by the Executors, that he should have an unincumbered, indefeasible title, without which he would not have purchased. 2dly. That for ten years after he took possession, the title was in litigation, the defence of which cost him much trouble and money, and he was advised that he could not safely pay the purchase money while the title was in suspense. 3dly. That he was always ready and willing, after the money became due, to have paid it, if he could have been indemnified for the loss of the land. To these reasons, the Counsel, in the argument here, added another, to wit, that before Selden had notice of the Deed, the inquisition had been found, the land escheated, and seized in law, (though not in fact,) into the hands of the Commonwealth, and if Selden continued in possession, he was an intruder, liable to the suit of the Commonwealth, and therefore could not be liable at the same time for interest on the purchase money.

470 *With respect to the two first grounds, that the Appellant was to have an unincumbered and perfect title, and that he has been ten years in litigation about it, it does not seem to me that this furnishes any ground for withholding interest. The Executors have not broken their covenant: they sold the land to the Appellant, put him in possession, and made him a Deed. The Commonwealth then advanced a claim to the land, and commenced proceedings to recover it, but this was no breach of the covenant of the Executors. They undertook to sell and convey a perfect title to the land, but not that there should be no claimants who would suit for it. What they undertook they have made good, for their title has thus far proved a perfect one. The trouble and expense of defending the suit, are what all must encounter, who are sued, and raises no claim either in Law, or in Equity, against the Executors. The event has proved that there was no ground for the suit.

Thirdly. The Appellant was always ready and willing to pay the money, if he could have gotten indemnity. Without stopping to enquire whether he had a right to require such indemnity in an executed contract like this, it is obvious to remark that, according to the best settled rules, the statement that he was ready and willing to pay, is wholly insufficient to protect him from the payment of interest. He was then in possession of the land, receiving the issues and profits; he was also in possession of the money, the price of the land, and it must be a strong and clear case which could protect him, under these circumstances, from paying interest; a case, showing that he had a right to retain the money, that he did in fact keep it useless and unproductive by him, and that he gave the other party notice that it was thus unproductive. This is settled in many cases. Thus, in Powell v. Martyr, 8 Ves. 146, during the delay which took place in discussing the title, the purchaser had the money deposited in the hands of his Solicitor, to be paid so soon as the objections to the title were cleared, and he proved

this, and also that his Solicitor
471 *told the Solicitor on the other side, that the money was ready; but the purchaser was in possession of the land, and because he did not give notice that the money was lying unproductive, Sir William Grant lays it down as settled, that he must pay interest. This was a case, too, where the delay proceeded from the vendor. See Sugden, 319-20-21. There are many other cases. In the case before us, the vendors were in no default: they had put the vendee in possession, and made a Deed conveying him a perfect title; and though he states that he was ready and willing to pay, if he could get security for the title, he does not state that he gave the vendors notice of this; nor does he state, nor does it appear in evidence, that in fact the money was ever for a moment lying idle. It must then be taken that he was in the enjoyment both of the land and the money, and in all conscience he ought to pay interest, unless he be protected by the objection taken at the Bar, that by the finding of the Inquest, the land (in Law) was seized into the hands of the Commonwealth, and Selden became an intruder upon her possession, and liable to her for the rents and profits.

With respect to the Common Law doctrine of offices, the office of instruction, and the office of entitling, and whether the finding of the office of entitling carries the seizin and possession to the Commonwealth in all cases, or in those only where the possession is vacant; these points were discussed at the bar with learning and ability, but I shall not enter into an examination of them, as I think the point before us can be well settled by the Act of Assembly. The 7th section of our Law of Escheats, 1 Rev. Co. 295, says, "And if the Inquisition be found for the Commonwealth, and there shall be any man that will make claim to the lands, he shall be heard without delay, on a traverse to the office, Monstrans de Droit, or Petition of Right; and the said lands, &c. shall be committed to him, if he show good evidence of his right and title to hold, until the right shall be found and discussed for the Commonwealth, or, for the 472 *party, finding sufficient surety to prosecute his suit with effect, and to render and pay to the Commonwealth the yearly value of the lands, if the right be discussed for the Commonwealth." When the office in the case at bar was found, Selden was in actual possession of the land, and he did make claim to it, as his

Monstrans de Droit, filed in the District Court, at their next Term, shows. Being in possession of the land, he would of course continue to hold, until some attempt was made, under the office, to dispossess him. When such attempt was made, it would be time enough for him to avail himself of the terms on which the Act permitted him to retain possession; or, if no attempt were made to turn him out, the District Court perhaps might have required the security mentioned by the Law as a pre-requisite to his filing the Monstrans de Droit, and contesting the title of the Commonwealth. If this requisition had been made, it would have been time enough then, for him to have given the proper security; but no attempt to oust him was made; no security was required of him; the case went on, and he sustained his claim, and proved that the Commonwealth had no pretence of title. Suppose he had been required, and had given the security directed by the Act; it would, in the event which has happened, have been of no effect, for the bond (as directed by the Law,) must have been on condition "to prosecute his suit with effect, and pay the Commonwealth the yearly value of the land, if the right be discussed for the Commonwealth." Now, he did prosecute his suit with effect, and the right, so far from being discussed for the Commonwealth, was discussed for him. Thus, if he had given a bond with surety, in any amount, he would completely have discharged it, by a compliance with the condition, and not a cent could have been recovered on it; and can it possibly be supposed that the Commonwealth, in the event which has happened, would be better off than if bond with security had been given? That after the right had been discussed against 473 her, she could have recovered *from Selden the yearly value of the lands? Surely not: and if not, the argument falls to the ground. He was never liable to the Commonwealth for the yearly profits; he received them, and held the money, and I am most clear that he ought, on every principle, to pay the interest; and that the Decree be affirmed.

JUDGES COALTER, and CABELL, concurred, and the Decree was affirmed.

*For monographic note on Sales, see end of case.
†Sale of Chattels—Right of Property—Delivery Necessary to.—In contracts of sale of chattels, a constructive or symbolical delivery is sufficient to pass the right to the chattel sold, and put it at the risk of the vendee: the cases cited in Pleasants v. Pendleton prove this. Elam v. Keen, 4 Leigh 335.

It is the admitted principle of the common law, that the title to personal property passes by the actual delivery or by a constructive delivery of it, as in the case of Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 478, and many like cases. Mortgages and deeds of trust of personal property which are directed by statute to be recorded, (by which the title passes without actual delivery) do not impair this principle of the common law. A bill of sale of personal property absolute on its face, is not within the statute, and need not be recorded to give any greater validity to it; and if recorded, it does not effect this property: an actual delivery either in fact, or law, not necessary.

Same—When Title Passes;—Case at Bar.—One merchant sells to another one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour, lying in a certain ware-house: the barrels have on them the brands of eight different mills: the price is agreed on; the vendee gives a check on the Bank for the agreed price of the whole quantity: the vendor gives at the same time to the vendee a bill of parcels, specifying the number of barrels of each particular brand, and an order on the warehouse-man for the flour, and a receipt in full for the price of the flour.—This is a complete, and execut d contract, and the property in the flour was passed to the vendee. The warehouse, and all its contents, including the flour and the check, with other papers of the vendor, being burnt the next morning, before the actual delivery of the flour, the loss is the vendee's, and the vendor may recover the price.

Same—Same—Same.—It having been proved to be the usage, when barrels of flour are delivered by a warehouse-man to a purchaser, to charge the cooperage, if any is needed, to the storer, and also the storage, (waiving any lien on the flour for such storage) and to deliver the flour to the order of the storer when called for, such a sale as that above mentioned, does not come within the class of cases where something remains to be done by the vendor to complete the contract.

Same—Same—Same.—In this case there were in the same warehouse at the time of the sale, a great many other barrels of fine, and superfine flour, belonging to other persons, but none of them had the same brands as those the subject of this sale: and the vendor, instead of one hundred and nineteen, had in fact one hundred and twenty-three barrels of fine flour: that is, two more of one of the brands, and two more of another of the brands, than he had actually sold: but it was proved that between barrels of the same brand and quality, there is no difference in price. The one hundred and twenty-three were easily distinguishable from the whole mass in the warehouse: and although the one hundred and nineteen were never separated from the other four, yet the former number belonged to the vendee, and the latter to the vendor, and it was of no consequence, which were the individual barrels which should be subducted as unsold, all the barrels of the same brand being exactly of the same value. The property in the one hundred and nineteen barrels passed to the vendee, notwithstanding the want of separation.

Trover's—When It Lies—Case Approved.—The case of Jackson v. Anderson, 4 Taunt. 24 (in which it was held that Trover would lie for 1960 Spanish dollars, intermixed in a barrel which contained 4718,) much approved of.

Contracts—Interpretation—Resort to Usage.—An established usage, constitutes the common understanding of parties, and ought to be resorted to, as the interpreter of the contract. An usage, that flour in store is sold by order, and passes by the transfer of the order from hand to hand, without actual delivery of the flour, is a reasonable usage, and ought to be enforced as part of the contract.

Instruction—Law.—An instruction of the Court to the Jury, that if they believe the evidence (reciting it) in which there is no contrariety (except in a matter in which the Court takes that which was given for the Defendant to be true,) the Plaintiff had a right to recover in the action, not speaking of the amount of the damages, is not erroneous. It is an instruction on the law, not on the fact.

The principal case is cited in Davis v. Miller, 14 Gratt. 22.

This was an action on the Case, brought by William G. Pendleton, in the Superior Court of Law for Henrico County, against Ralston & Pleasants. The Declaration contained various counts. The first count demanded 416 dollars 50 cents, on account of one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour, sold Defendants at that price, and alleged an assumpsit to pay that sum for the flour. The second count was for the same quantity of flour, and charged an assumpsit to pay so much money as the flour was reasonably worth, with an averment that it was reasonably worth the said sum of 416 dollars 50 cents. The third count was for money had and received by Defendants, to Plaintiff's use. The fourth count charged that the Defendants were indebted to the Plaintiff, in the sum of 416 dollars 50 cents, by a certain check drawn by them, on the Bank of Virginia, and delivered by them to the Plaintiff, in consideration of one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour, before that time sold and delivered to them, by Plaintiff, at their special instance and request, which said check so by them drawn and delivered to the Plaintiff, was in fact before presentation for payment, destroyed by accidental fire, and the amount thereof, nor any part of it, has been received by Plaintiff, nor have the said Defendants renewed the said check to Plaintiff, and avers notice of the destruction of said check, on the part of said Defendants. To this Declaration, the Defendant Archibald Pleasants, pleaded non-assumpsit, (the other partner, Ralston, having been returned no inhabitant, and the suit abated as to him,) to which Plaintiff replied generally. The Jury found a verdict for Plaintiff, and assessed his damages to 416 dollars 50 cents, with interest from 20th March, 1820, until paid; and Judgment was entered accordingly, against Archibald Pleasants.

The questions in this case, arise out of a Bill of Exceptions taken at the trial, by the Defendants, to certain opinions delivered by the Court.

That Bill of Exceptions is as follows, viz:

"Memorandum. That on the trial of the issue joined in this cause, evidence was introduced for the purpose of proving that on the 20th of March, 1820, the Plaintiff sold to the Defendant, one of the mercantile firm of Ralston & Pleasants, one hundred and forty-one barrels of fine flour, of the Richmond inspection, with certain specific mill brands on them, agreeably to a list containing the number of each brand, exhibited to the Defendant, at $3 50 per barrel, then stored in the warehouse of J. & J. Fisher, jr., in said city, which list is in the hand-writing of the Plaintiff, in the words and figures following, to wit: 'Pedlar, 62, very good; Rose's, 26; Bent Creek, 7; Fredonian, 10; Rocky Creek, 18; D. S. Garland, 13; Rockford, 5; 141 barrels, $3 50, $493 50 cents.'" That the Plaintiff at the same time received from the Defendant, a check on the Virginia Bank, for $493 50 cents, the whole amount of the price of the said one hundred and 476 forty-one barrels of fine flour, and gave the Defendant an order on the warehouse-keepers for the flour; that this sale was effected before two o'clock of the said day, though on this point there was a variance in the evidence; a witness stating that he believed that it was at a later period: that in the course of the same day, and in the evening, the Plaintiff finding that he had mistaken the number of barrels of the fine flour which he had stored in the said warehouse, sent to the Defendants a corrected list, reducing the number of barrels of fine flour to one hundred and nineteen; which list, as corrected, is in the words and figures following, to wit: 'Pedlar, 62, very good; Rose's, 2 only; Bent Creek, 7; Fredonian, 10; Rocky Mills, 20, (instead of 18;) D. S. Garland, 13; Rocky Ford, 5:' That thereupon the former order was given up by the Defendant, and the check by the Plaintiff: that a new bargain was then made, by which the one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour, of certain specified mill brands, then stored in the warehouse of the said J. & J. Fisher, jr., were sold by the Plaintiff, to the Defendant, as one of the firm of Ralston & Pleasants, merchants in Richmond: that the Plaintiff gave the Defendant an order on the said J. & J. Fisher, jr., for the delivery of the said one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour, by specific numbers and brands, which order is in the words and figures following, to wit: 'Messrs. John & J. Fisher, jr., Gentlemen, Deliver to Messrs. Ralston & Pleasants, one hundred and nineteen barrels of Richmond fine flour, which are stored with you, of the following brands, viz: Pedlar, 62 barrels; Rose, 2 barrels; Bent Creek, 7 barrels; Fredonian, 10 barrels; Rocky Creek, 20 barrels; D. S. Garland, 13 barrels; Rockford, 5 barrels. Yr. mo. Wm. G. Pendleton. Richmond, 20th March, 1820:' That the Plaintiff rendered to the Defendant a bill for the same, amounting to 416 dollars 50 cents, passed his receipt for the amount thereof, and received from the Defendant a check on the Bank of Virginia, for the said sum of 416 dollars 50 cents, being the stipulated price for 477 the said one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour: that it is the usage of the Banks in the said city, well known to all the merchants and dealers with the said Banks, in said city, and elsewhere, not to pay any check after three o'clock in the evening: that this last bargain was closed between two and four o'clock in the evening of that day, though there was a variance in the evidence on that point; one witness stating that to be the time, according to his belief, and another that he thought it was between three and five: that at the time of the said sale, the said Plaintiff had also in store in the said warehouse, about three hundred barrels of superfine flour, and that there was also stored therein, belonging to other persons, a number of other barrels of flour, (between two and three thousand,) of different brands, and of different qualities, though there was no flour there other than the Plaintiff's, of the same mill brands with the said one hundred and nineteen: that at the time the said order was given, there was a considerable fall of rain, and that the rain continued from thence till night: that in fact, as the store-keeper testified, the Plaintiff had at the time of the sale aforesaid, one hundred and twenty-three barrels of fine flour, of the brands specified, stored as above mentioned, viz: two more of Rose's, and two more of Pedlar's brand, than were specified in the said corrected list, and that with this exception, the fine flour of the Plaintiff on hand, and that sold by him, corresponded in respect to the brands on them, and the number of barrels of each brand: that although there is less difference in the market as to price, between the different mill brands of fine, than of superfine flour, yet there is a difference; but that between barrels of fine flour, of the same mill brand, there is no difference whatever: that the said one hundred and nineteen barrels had not, at the time of the said sale, nor at the time of the fire hereafter mentioned, been separated from the said one hundred and twenty-three barrels, nor from the larger parcels stored in the said warehouse:

478 that on the morning of the 21st of March, 1820, before day-break, the said warehouse accidentally caught fire, and it, together with the said flour, was entirely consumed, and that the check aforesaid, for 416 dollars 50 cents, owned by said Plaintiff, and being in his counting room, which was a part of the same building, was consumed also: that the Defendant, about eight o'clock of the morning of the 21st of March, whilst the fire was yet raging, demanded of the said J. & J. Fisher, jr., a delivery of the said one hundred and nineteen barrels of flour, according to the order therefor, which he then produced, but the order was not complied with, it having become by the act of God, impossible: that the Defendant, on the same morning of the 21st of March, directed the Cashier of the said Bank of Virginia not to pay the said check for 416 dollars 50 cents.

"That it was, and is, the usage of the store-house-keepers in the city of Richmond, well known to the merchants thereof, (when the transaction aforesaid took place, and the said flour was stored,) to charge the vendor of the flour with the storage, and to deliver it to his order when called for: that it was not usual for the store-keepers to deliver flour during a rain, nor in the evening after dark, and that the practice was well known to the merchants: But the warehouse-keeper said, in giving his evidence that if the flour had been called for, on that evening, he would have delivered it, notwithstanding the rain, and that he thought it could have been delivered in an hour: that the storage due on said flour, had not, at the time of said fire, been paid: but the warehouse-keeper said, in his evidence, that he would have delivered any flour of the Plaintiff's to his order, on demand, notwithstanding the storage had not been paid, holding him responsible for it, and charging him with it: That it sometimes happens, that the flour, when about to be delivered out, requires cooping, in which case, according to usage in said city, well known to the merchants thereof, the cooping is done by the storer, at the expense of the vendor; that sometimes out of a 479 *hundred barrels, no cooping is required; sometimes forty out of a hundred barrels require it, and that the average expense of cooping is two cents a barrel, or $2 for every hundred barrels.

"That it was, and is, in the common course of trade in the said city of Richmond, for flour to be sold by draft or order on the store-keeper, and to pass by that mode of transfer, through many different hands, without actual delivery.

"The evidence on both sides, having been closed, the Defendant by his Counsel, moved the Court to instruct the Jury, that if, in their opinion, the engagement of the Plaintiff was to sell and deliver to the Defendant one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour, (as contradistinguished from superfine flour or cross-middlings) of which so many barrels were to be of one mill brand, and so many of others, (as in the corrected list above mentioned,) that this constituted a special contract, and that the Plaintiff on such contract could not recover under the Declaration filed in this cause. But, the Court overruled the motion, refusing to give such instruction. To which opinion of the Court the said Defendant excepted.

"And thereupon the Counsel for the Plaintiff and for the Defendant, argued the law, as well as the facts of the case, before the Jury, and concurred in asking the Court to instruct the Jury on the Law; wherefore the Court did instruct the Jury, that if they were of opinion that the evidence aforesaid, adduced by Plaintiff and Defendant, is true, and proves every fact which it purports to prove, and that the only fact of said evidence, in which there is a variance, (viz: that respecting the time of the evening in which the sale aforesaid was made,) was in favor of the Defendant, (that is to say, if they should be of opinion that the sale was made as late in the evening as five o'clock,) that the Plaintiff had a right to recover in this action; (and in support of this instruction the Court assigned its reason at large, but 480 it is deemed unnecessary, and improper, to place *that argument on this paper;) to which instruction of the Court, the Defendant by his Counsel excepted. The Defendant's Counsel then moved the Court to instruct the Jury, that if, in their opinion, the usage of trade in the city aforesaid, or the contract between the parties, required that the flour, the subject of the said contract, should be, when delivered, in merchantable order, it was incumbent on said Plaintiff to prove to their satisfaction, that the flour aforesaid was merchantable; but the Court declined giving such instructions, 1st. Because the said proposition is partly abstract, not growing out of the evidence, the whole of which is herein before set down, and because, so far as it is relevant to the case, the Court has already given its opinion upon it. 2d. Because after the Court had given its opinion, on the whole Law of the case, upon motion of the Plaintiff's Counsel, with the concurrence of the Defendant's Counsel, and after an argument from both sides, before the Jury, on the law and the evidence, it is deemed inadmissible and irregular, to receive detailed motions, for instructions to the Jury. And therefore overruled the motion. To which several opinions of the Court, the Defendant by his Counsel excepted."

From the Judgment in this case, the Defendant in the Superior Court, appealed to the Court of Appeals.

The Attorney General and Stanard for the Appellant.

June 4. The Judges delivered their opinions.*

JUDGE CARR.

The Appellee sued the Appellant in Assumpsit, on a contract for so much flour sold. The Declaration had several 481 *counts, some special, some general.

The Jury found a general verdict for the Plaintiff for $416 50, on which Judgment was rendered. On a subsequent day of the Term, the Counsel for the Defendant, with the consent of the opposing Counsel, tendered a Bill of Exceptions to sundry opinions of the Court, given on the trial. The Bill sets out at large what the evidence was intended to prove, and on this statement, several motions for instruction to the Jury are predicated. But one of them was the subject of discussion at the Bar, and to that I shall confine my remarks. The Court instructed the Jury, "that if they believed that the evidence adduced was true, and proved every fact which it purported to prove, and that the sale took place at five o'clock in the evening, (the only fact as to which there was any variance,) the Plaintiff had a right to recover in this action." To enable us to judge of the correctness of this instruction, we must look into the evidence first, and then to the law of the case.

On the 20th March, 1820, the Appellee sold to the Appellant one hundred and forty-one barrels of fine flour, with certain mill brands on them, according to a list stating the number of barrels of each brand. The price was $3 50 cents per barrel. The flour was stored in the warehouse of J. & J. Fisher. The Plaintiff received from the Defendant a check on the Virginia Bank for the full amount of the price, and executed and delivered to the Defendant an order for the flour on the warehouse man. In the evening of the same day, the Plaintiff finding that he had mistaken the number of barrels, sent a corrected list to the Defendant, reducing the number to one hundred and nineteen barrels. Upon this, the order and check were given up, and a new contract made, by which the one hundred and nineteen barrels of flour, according to the list, were sold by the Plaintiff to the Defendant for the same price, amounting to $416 50 cents. For this sum the Defendant gave the Plaintiff a check on the Virginia Bank, and the Plaintiff gave a receipt in full, and an order for the flour. The set out at large. This last agreement was made, (to say the latest,) about five o'clock in the evening. It is the usage of the Banks of Richmond, well known to merchants and others dealing with them, not to pay checks after 3 o'clock, P. M. At the time of the sale, the Plaintiff had in the same store-house about three hundred barrels superfine flour, and there were there also between two and three thousand barrels, belonging to others, of different qualities and brands, but none other but the Plaintiff's with the same brands as the one hundred and nineteen barrels. At the time of giving the order for the flour, there was a considerable fall of rain, which continued till night. At the time of the sale the Plaintiff had in fact four more barrels of fine flour than he sold to the Defendant in the same house, and of the same brands, to wit: two of Rose's and two of Fedlar's brand. Except this, the list corresponded exactly with the fine flour which the Plaintiff had in Fishers' store-house, both in number and brands. Between barrels of fine flour of the same brand, there is no difference in price. On the morning of the 21st March, the warehouse accidentally took fire, and was burnt, together with the check for the price of the flour, and the flour itself; the one hundred and nineteen barrels having never been separated from the four barrels of the Plaintiff, nor the larger parcels belonging to others. The Defendant, on the same morning directed the Cashier not to pay the $416 50 cents. It is not the practice in Richmond for the keepers of storehouses to deliver flour in the rain, nor after dark; but, this flour, if it had been called for on that evening, would have been delivered, and it could have been done, the store-keeper said, in an hour. It sometimes happens that flour, about to be delivered, wants cooorage, in which case the usage, well known to merchants is, that the cooorage is done by the storer, at the expense of the vendor: sometimes forty barrels in one hundred will want coooring; sometimes not one. It has been, and 483 is the usage of storers* in Richmond, well known to the merchants, to charge the vendor of the flour with the storage, and to deliver it to his order whenever called for. The storer in this case would have delivered any flour of the Plaintiff's to his order, on demand, though the storage was not paid, holding him responsible, and charging him with it. It has been, and is the common course of trade in Richmond, for flour in store to be sold by draft or order on the store-keeper, and to pass, by the transfer of the order through many different hands, without actual delivery of the flour to any.

We are to consider whether, taking all these facts as proved to the satisfaction of the Jury, the Court properly instructed them, that the Plaintiff ought to recover in this action, remarking by the way, that the instruction touches no matter of fact, but matter of law solely; that it does not speak of the recovery, as to amount, or quantity, but merely as to the right: "that the Plaintiff, (if they believed the evidence) had a right to recover," so that if he have a right to recover any part of his demand, the Court was right, and it remained for the Jury to settle the amount.

The great question is, to whom did the flour belong when burnt, for the owner must bear the loss. Was the contract so complete as to pass the property? We will consider this, first, upon the general principles which regulate contracts of sale; secondly, upon the usage found, that flour passes from hand to hand, by the transfer of the order, without the actual delivery of possession.

1st. To charge on a contract of sale, and put at the risk of the vendee, a constructive delivery is enough. An actual delivery, neither in law, nor in fact, is required. It is only necessary that it be such as to pass the entire right of property. A symbolical delivery, as the key of a warehouse where the goods are deposited, will pass them to the vendee. 1 Atk. 171; 1 East. 195; 3 John. Rep. 395. So, if the contract of sale be complete, though the goods

484 continue *in the warehouse where stored at the time of sale, under an agreement to be free of storage for a certain number of days, and during that time they be burnt, the vendee must bear the loss. Phillimore v. Barry, 1 Camp. 513. So, where the vendor has no further act to do, to ascertain the quantity, quality, or price of the article sold, the vendee must bear every loss by fire, &c. though he could not withdraw the goods from the place of deposit, because the duties were not paid, the fact that they were not paid being proclaimed at the sale, and vendor being in no default for the non-payment between the sale and burning. Hinde v. Whitehouse, 7 East. 558. But if by the terms of sale, there remains anything to be done by the vendor in order to render the goods deliverable, a loss subsequent to the sale, and prior to the doing of that act, must be borne by the vendor. If, therefore, weighing be necessary to ascertain the quantity, Hansom v. Meyer, 6 East. 614; or some casks remained to be filled up, to make them of one weight, Ragg v. Minett, 11 East. 210; or the contents of bales are to be counted, Zagury v. Firnelli, 2 Camp. 240; or it be the duty of the vendor to do any other act, for ascertaining the quantity, quality, or price of the article, it is for such part as is not ascertained, at his risk, though the remainder will be at that of the purchaser. See Shepley v. Davis, 5 Taunt. 617; Busk v. Davis, 2 Mau. & Selw. 397, and many other cases. All these go upon the ground, that by the contract some essential act remained to be done by the vendor, as between vendor and vendee, to the completion of the contract, and whenever this is the case, the property does not pass, but remains in the vendor, and at his risk.

The doctrine of stoppage in transitu, must be cautiously applied to the case before us. It is established Law in England, that if goods be consigned to a merchant, and when they reach him he has become bankrupt, they go to his assignees, though the consignor should remain wholly unpaid, and though when he consigned them, 485 he considered *his correspondents to be in good credit. The harshness and injustice of this principle is felt, and lamented by the Judges, and they go as far as they can in favor of an unpaid vendor. Thus, in Hammond v. Anderson, 4 Bos. & Pull. 70, Sir J. Mansfield, Ch. J. says, "the right of stopping in transitu is a favourable right, which the Courts of Law are always disposed to assist." In Scott v. Pettit, 3 Bos. & Pull. 469, Lord Alvanley, who had tried the cause at N. P. says, "At the trial I could not help forming the wish, that the question, how far the bankruptcy of Beckley had operated as a countermand of his previous orders to Messrs. Wallers, should be considered by the Court. But in looking into the cases, I find that question to be completely closed in Westminster Hall, and that we therefore are bound to hold, that though a bankrupt has altogether ceased to be a trader, his warehouse continues open, for the purpose of receiving goods, and that the assignees have a right to take possession of every thing that may come into their hands, without paying a single farthing, even though the consignors of the goods are not entitled to come in under the commission." And Heath, J. says, "It is much to be lamented, that goods consigned to a bankrupt, which arrive after the act of bankruptcy, as in this case, should ever be considered a part of the bankrupt's effects. The hardship to which this rule of Law had given rise to, in particular cases, was the occasion of introducing the doctrine of stoppage in transitu." It is not strange, that in their wish to restrict, and mitigate this harsh doctrine, the Judges should sometimes decide that goods are still in transitu, when, if the question were between two equally innocent, which should bear the loss, they would, under the same circumstances, have decided that the possession was changed, and the vendee the owner. When the question of transit is decided against the unpaid vendor, we may safely take such a case as applying a fortiori to a question of mere risk.

486 *Let us now see how these general doctrines apply to our case. Two merchants in the City of Richmond come together; the one is a seller of flour, the other a buyer. The seller exposes his bill of parcels: here I have one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour, lying in Fishers' warehouse: these are the particular brands, and number of each brand: my price is $3 50 per barrel, cash. The buyer says, I will take it. The amount is calculated, for which he gives a check on the Bank. The seller at the same time gives him a bill of parcels, an order on the warehouse man, and a receipt in full for the price of the flour. Is not this a complete, and executed contract? The money paid, and the flour delivered. That the check was made, and understood as a cash payment, none will doubt, who recollects that, since the institution of Banks, the merchants have used them as a place of deposit for their funds, and make all their money payments by checks on them. The receipt in full, too, shows that the seller at least thought that he had gotten his money. It would seem strange, if in return he did not give the flour. An actual, manual delivery of it, was, from the nature of the article, not to be expected; but fair dealing required that something equivalent should be done, and the vendee would hardly have paid his money, without getting what he considered equal to an actual delivery: he got the order, directing the warehouse man to deliver him one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour of specified brands. Excluding all subsequent events from our view, and looking at this contract as the parties did at the moment of making it, can we doubt for an instant, that they considered it complete; that each party had done all that he had to do with it? And the intention of the parties, we know, is of the essence of contracts. This seems to me, the common sense, practical view of the subject, and it is fully supported by the Law. A bargain struck, and payment of the purchase money, vests the property of the chattel in the vendee. 2 487 Black. Com. 448. This was "admitted in the case of a specific chattel, as a horse; but, the principle is applicable to every case where the subject of the bargain is so designated as to be clearly distinguishable. Thus, in Hinde v. Whitehouse, Lord Ellenborough applies it to a sale of sugars at auction, which were afterwards burnt. In support of his opinion, he cites with approbation, a passage from Noy's Maxims, 88, where it is said, that "if I sell my horse for money, and the horse die in my stable between the bargain and delivery, I may have an action of debt for my money, because by the bargain, the property was in the buyer." And it will be observed, that in this case, Lord Ellenborough lays great stress on the meaning of the parties, and "what was considered between them."

Phillimore v. Barry, 1 Camp. 513. This was a sale of rum, forming part of the cargo of a Danish prize, which was lodged in the warehouse of Fector & Minet, of Dover. The terms of sale, were a deposit of 25 per cent. to be paid immediately, and the remainder in thirty day; at the end of that time, purchasers to take away the goods, or afterwards to pay warehouse rent. Thirteen puncheons of this rum, consisting of several lots, were bid for, and knocked down to an agent of the Defendants, for them. Before the thirty days elapsed, the warehouse caught fire, and by means of a quantity of gunpowder lodged in them, were blown into the air. There was no evidence of the deposit being paid. The action was brought by the seller, to recover the price of the rum. The first question was upon their Statute of Frauds, the 17th section of which requires a memorandum in writing, in certain cases, in the sale of personal chattels, in this, differing from ours. Having discussed that point, Lord Ellenborough held, that the property vested absolutely in the purchasers, from the moment of the sale, and there was a verdict for the Plaintiff.

But it was contended, that the case before us falls within that class of cases, where something still remained to be done by the vendor to complete the contract, and 488 therefore "that the property in the flour did not pass, and this something, it is said, was the cooerage, and the warehouse rent, both of which were chargeable to the vendor. But it must be remembered, that that which remains to be done, must be something essential to put the articles sold, in a deliverable state, and something, too, between vendor and vendee. As to the cooerage it does not appear that any was wanting in this case; and if it was, the usage proved is, that it was done by the storer, at the vendor's expense. As to the warehouse rent, that formed no lien on the flour, for it is proved to be the usage, to charge it, (not upon the flour, but) to the vendor, and "to deliver the flour to his order when called for." Neither of these things, then, show any thing farther to be done by the vendor, nor any obstacle existing to the delivery of the flour. The vendee had only to present his order to the warehouse-man, and the flour would have been rolled out to him, without a moment's delay. The case of Austin v. Craven, 4 Taunt. 643, is not like this. That was Trover for fifty hogsheds of sugar, of a particular description, to be delivered on board a British ship. The action failed, because the Plaintiff could not prove that the Defendants (who were sugar refiners) ever had on hand the specified quantity and description of sugars sold: here it is in proof that every barrel of flour called for by the order was at the warehouse. Nor is this case like that of Busk v. Davis, 2 Mau. & Selw. 397. That was a sale of ten tons of Riga flax, lying at the Defendant's wharf, at 118l. per ton: the flax was in mats, varying in quantity from three to five or six hundred weight. The quantity sold was to be ascertained by weighing by the wharfinger, and to make up ten tons might require the breaking of the flax mats. Before payment for the flax, the vendee became bankrupt, and the vendor sent an order to the Defendant, at whose wharf the flax still remained, not to deliver it. The assignees of the bankrupt brought Trover. Lord Ellenborough says, "The question in this case is, whether the property has been so ascertained

489 "as to be considered in law as effectually delivered, the order to deliver having been given to the wharfingers, and entered on their books. That would not, of itself, be sufficient, unless the flax were in a deliverable state, and if farther acts were necessary to be done by the seller to make it so. Here it appears that farther acts were necessary; for, the flax was to be weighed, and the portion of the entire bulk to be delivered, was to be ascertained; and if the weight of any number of unbroken mats was insufficient to satisfy the quantity agreed upon, it would have been necessary to break open some mats in order to make up that quantity. Therefore, it was impossible for the purchaser to say that any precise number of mats exclusively belonged to him." Observe the striking difference between that case and ours. There, the flax was put up in mats, and sold by the ton: to make up the number of tons sold, it might be necessary to break up some of the mats. Here, the flour was put up in barrels, and sold by the barrel: no further process necessary, no weighing, no barrel to be broken to make up the quantity. There, it was impossible for the buyer to say that any precise number of mats belonged to him. If he could have said so, the argument of the Chief Justice leads directly to the conclusion, that the decision would have been different. Here, the vendee could say what precise number of barrels belonged to him; his order designated number and brand, precisely.

But, I will now cite a case, which (if I mistake not strangely,) will remove the objection, that there was no such separation here, as would enable the vendee to designate any particular barrels as his property; an objection founded on the fact, that there were in the warehouse, and belonging to Pendleton, two barrels of the Rose, and two of the Pedlar brand, which were not sold with the one hundred and nineteen. The case is Jackson v. Anderson, 4 Taunt. 24. Saddler, Jackson & Co. consigned to Fielding, residing at Buenos Ayres, goods to be sold for them. He sold the goods,

490 *the proceeds, calculated in dollars, and annexed to the following letter.

"Gent: Annexed, I hand you an account of sales of four trunks, nett proceeds, 1,969 Spanish dollars, which amount I shall ship per the Cheerly, gun brig, Lieutenant Fularton, who will sail direct for England, in ten or fourteen days," &c. Sometime afterwards, the Plaintiff received the following letter, brought by the ship Cheerly. "Gent: I have by this conveyance, sent to my friends, Messrs. Laycock & Co. a bill of lading for a barrel of dollars, marked — 100, in which are included for you, and on your account, $1,969, which sum will be rendered to you by said gentlemen," &c. On the receipt of this letter, the Plaintiffs applied to Laycock & Co., and after being put off several times, were at length told, that they had transferred the bill of lading to a friend. On further enquiry, they found that the barrel of dollars, on its arrival, had been deposited in the Bank of England, and that the bill of lading, endorsed severally by Fielding, Laycock & Co., and the Defendants, had been transmitted to the Bullion Office by the Defendants, of whom the Bank had purchased the dollars, and paid them the sum of 1,098l. 13s, being the value of $4,718, contained in the barrel, which sum the Defendants carried to the credit of Laycock & Co., with whom they had an account as Bankers. Upon this, the Plaintiffs demanded the $1,969 of the Defendants, who refused to deliver them up, and thereupon they brought Trover for them. A verdict and Judgment at Nisi Prius, were taken for the Plaintiffs for 418l. 18s, with leave to the Defendants to move to enter a nonsuit. In support of the motion, it was urged by Shepherd and Vaughan, Sergeants, that admitting the barrel, consigned to Laycock & Co., to be the same from which the $1,969 were intended to be appropriated to the Plaintiffs, still there has not been any such appropriation of them, as will entitle the Plaintiffs to this form of action. The objection,

491 *they said is, that there has not been any act done in respect to the $1,969, claimed by the Plaintiffs to separate them from the rest, so as to enable the Plaintiffs to designate them as their own property; and when a demand was made, by the Plaintiffs, of the dollars, if the Defendant had desired them to point out which dollars were their property, they could not possibly have ascertained them, which shows that neither Trover nor Detinue will lie. This was the argument of eminent Counsel, and it will be admitted that it was put in its most imposing form. What said the Court? Its opinion was delivered by Mansfield, Ch. J. After disposing of the other objection, he remarks, "Another question has arisen from the intermixture of property. It appears that no separation was ever made from the whole quantity of $1,969, belonging to the Plaintiff; and an objection has been taken on that ground against the form of the action. But, we think there is no difficulty in that point. The Defendant has disposed of all the dollars: consequently, he has disposed of those which belong to the Plaintiffs; and as all are of the same value, it cannot be a question, what particular dollars were his. It is not like the case of tenants in common, who have a right to a part of every grain of corn, &c. Here, one has a right to a certain number, and the other to the rest. If a man keeps all, and has no right to a part, the action lies for that part, which he wrongfully detains." Now I ask, where is the difference with respect to separation between that case and this? If Trover could be maintained for $1,969, out of an undivided mass of $4,718, would not Trover equally lie for one hundred and nineteen barrels of flour out of one hundred and twenty-three? The dollars were not more alike than barrels of the same quality and brand. The dollars in the one case were consigned to Laycock & Co., and the bill of lading endorsed, and delivered to them: in the other case, the barrels of flour were stored with the warehouse-man. In the one case, a letter is written to the 492 Plaintiff, which is *considered as an order on the consignee for $1,969, out of a barrel containing $4,718: in the other, an order is given on the warehouse-man for one hundred and nineteen barrels of flour, of particular marks and brands, out of one hundred and twenty-three. If Trover could be maintained for the dollars, could it not equally for the flour. It was asked, suppose a part of the flour had been burnt, how would you have decided whose it was? I ask, suppose a part of the dollars had been stolen out of the barrel, whose loss would it have been? The very same difficulty is presented, yet we see that in the case of the dollars, the Court did not perplex themselves with it, but going on the great principles of justice, sustained the claim of property. Observe, too, the ground taken: "As all (the dollars) are of the same value, it cannot be a question, what particular dollars were his." In our case it is expressly in evidence, that between barrels of the same brand and quality, there is no difference in price. May we not say here then, "As all the barrels were of the same value, it cannot be a question, what particular barrels were his?" Again, the Chief Justice says, "Here, one has a right to a particular number, and the other to the rest." Did not the order in this case give the vendee a right to a particular number, one hundred and nineteen barrels? Yes; and the rest belonged to the vendor. Thus, I think I may fairly say, that leaving the custom out of the question, the case is with the Plaintiff.

But, surely, the custom puts it beyond all question. "An established usage (says Chief Justice Gibbs, in Lucas v. Dorrien, 2 Com. L. Rep. 105,) constitutes the common understanding of parties in their dealings, and on the foot of that common understanding, they are supposed to contract." See also Doug. 513, what Lord Mansfield says of a custom, even one year old; and see Starkie's Evid. pt. 4th, 452-3-4-5. The custom found is, that flour in store is sold by order, and passes by the transfer of the order, from hand to hand, without actual delivery of the 493 "flour to any." Now, engraft this into the contract of the parties before us, and the question must be decided, unless you say that the parties could not make such a contract; that such an usage cannot stand. And why should we say so? There is nothing illegal in it. The principal foundation of Mercantile Law is usage: and it has become Law, because the Courts, finding it established in practice, have respected it, and made it the rule of their decisions in mercantile cases. That this usage is convenient, is proved both by its existence, and the nature of the article. It saves the trouble to the merchant, of going twenty times a day to the different warehouses, to examine the different parcels of flour he had bought; for, under the usage, the order is a negotiable paper: the traders in flour look to the order only, and the flour passes by it from hand to hand: but, the character of the paper is changed at once, and the usage destroyed, if you say that however exactly it describes the flour, that flour shall not pass, if there be any other like it in the warehouse: the paper will no longer pass by its face, but before any buyer will pay his money, he will go to the warehouse with the bill of parcels, in his hand, and examine, not only to ascertain whether the flour described is there, but whether there may not be in the warehouse other flour of the same brand and quality. And why should we break up this usage, and impose this heavy clog on the commerce of the place? Especially, when in the case before us, it would have an ex post facto operation on the contract of the parties. It cannot be denied that, under the usage, they intended an immediate change of ownership as to the flour, and consequently, that from the moment of such change, it should be at the risk of the vendee; but, after the flour is burnt, we say that the usage is a bad one, and shall not stand, and giving this decision a retrospective action, throw the loss upon the vendor.

To show the weight which the Courts give to mercantile usage, I will refer to the subject of dock warrants, treated of in the following cases: Spear v. Travers, 494 4 Camp. 251; Zwinger v. Samuda*, 2 Com. Law Rep. 98; Lucas v. Dorrien, 2 Com. Law Rep. 105; and Keyser v. Suse, 5 Com. Law Rep. 461.

But, suppose that in the teeth of the contract, the usage and the cases cited, we say that no flour of Rose and Pedlar brands passed, because there were two barrels of each more than were sold. Still as regards the flour of the Bent Creek, Fredonian, Rocky Creek, D. S. Garland, and Rockford brands, we must say that passed by the order, because all in the warehouse, of those brands and quality, were contained in the order: (as in Rugg v. Minet, the Court decided that the property passed to the vendee, in all the casks that were filled up.) And if the property in any of the flour passed to the vendee, the vendor had a right to recover for so much, however small the quantity; and the instruction of the Court which we are discussing, and upon which the whole turns, was not wrong, for, the Court instruct the Jury, that if they believe the evidence, the Plaintiff had a right to recover in this action, not pretending to speak as to the amount of the recovery, but as to the form of the action; as to the law, not as to the facts.

Upon general principles, then, and also upon the usage, I am of opinion, that all the flour in the order passed by it to the vendee, and that he must bear the loss; but if only a part passed, it is clear to me that the Court did not err in its instruction to the Jury. The Judgment must be affirmed.

JUDGE CABELL.

This was an action of Assumpsit, brought in the Superior Court Court of Law for the County of Henrico, by William G. Pendleton, against Gabriel Ralston and Archibald Pleasants, merchants and partners, trading under the firm of Ralston & Pleasants for $416 50, the price of one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour sold and delivered by Pendleton to Ralston & Pleasants. The suit "abated as to 495 Ralston, by the return of the Sheriff, and was afterwards prosecuted against Pleasants only. The contract of sale was not denied by Pleasants; but his defence was that it was an executory contract only, and not a sale executed by delivery.

That a delivery of the flour was necessary to make it an executed sale, is not denied. Nor is it pretended that there was an actual delivery. But a constructive delivery is as effectual as an actual delivery: And the question is, whether there has been such delivery in this case.

The contract was for the sale of one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour, of certain specified mill brands, which Pendleton then had stored in the warehouse of J. & J. Fisher, in the City of Richmond. The price was fixed at $3 50 per barrel, to be paid in hand, amounting in the whole to $416 50. Ralston & Pleasants, as soon as the contract was entered into, gave to Pendleton their check on the Bank of Virginia, for the amount of the purchase money, and received from him a bill for the flour, and an order on J. & J. Fisher, to deliver the flour to them. The order was in the following terms: "Messrs. John & James Fisher, junr., Gentlemen, Deliver to Messrs. Ralston & Pleasants, one hundred and nineteen barrels Richmond fine flour, which are stored with you, of the following brands, viz: Pedlar, 62 barrels; Rose, 2 barrels; Bent Creek, 7 barrels; Fredonian, 10 barrels; Rocky Creek, 20 barrels; David S. Garland, 13 barrels; Rockford, 5 barrels. Yr. mo. Wm. G. Pendleton. Richmond, March 20, 1820." Pendleton actually had, at the time of the contract, in the warehouse of the Fishers, fine flour with which the order might have been strictly complied with. There was not, at that time, in the said warehouse, any fine flour of the specified brands, other than that which belonged to Pendleton; nor had he there any fine flour of the specified brands, beyond what the order called for, except that he had two more of "Pedlar" brand, and two more of

"Rose" brand, than the order required. But there is no difference whatever between barrels of fine flour of the same mill brand. "It is the common usage of trade in the City of Richmond, well known to the merchants thereof, for flour in store to be sold by draft or order on the storekeeper, and to pass by that mode of transfer, through many different hands, without actual delivery." The storage due for the flour in this case, was not paid by Pendleton, but "it is the usage of the store-housekeepers in the City of Richmond, well known to the merchants, to charge the vendor with the storage, and to deliver the flour to his order, when called for;" and it is proved in this case, that the flour would have been delivered, on the day of sale, had it been called for, notwithstanding the storage had not been paid. It sometimes happens that flour, when about to be delivered, is found to require coopering; but in such cases, it is the usage in the City of Richmond, well known to the merchants, for the cooperage to be done by the store, at the expense of the vendor.

It was insisted, by the Counsel for the Appellant, that there can be no constructive delivery, where any thing remains to be done, as between the vendor and vendee, to put the property into a deliverable condition. And it must be conceded that the cases referred to by him, fully established the principle. I will, however, take a hasty view of them, in order to show that the circumstances of those cases, are materially different from this case.

In Hanson v. Meyer, 6 East. 614, there was a sale of all a man's starch, at a certain warehouse, at so much per cent., and it was held that the same was not complete to pass the property, because the starch remained to be weighed, before even the price could be ascertained.

In Wallace v. Breeds, 13 East 522, there was a sale of fifty out of ninety tons of Greenland oil, which was in casks. It was held, that the property did not pass, because, according to the constant custom of the trade, the casks were to be searched by a cooper employed by the vendor; a broker, also, on behalf of both the vendor and 497 *vendee, was to attend and make a minute of the foot-dirt and water in each cask; and the casks were then to be filled up by the seller's cooper, and at his expense, so that they might be delivered in a complete state, containing the quantity sold.

In Austen v. Craven, 4 Taunt. 644, there was a sale of fifty hogsheads of sugar, of a certain quality, at so much per cwt. There were no hogsheads of such sugar in existence at the time of the contract. The hogsheads were to be filled and then weighed, before even the price could be ascertained. Held that the sale was not complete.

In Busk v. Davis, 2 Mau. & Selw. 397, there was a sale of ten tons out of eighteen tons of Riga flax, then lying at a certain wharf. The flax was in mats of different weights. It remained to weigh the flax, before it could be in a situation to be delivered; and it would be necessary to break some of the mats to make up the precise quantity sold. I say nothing at present, as to the right of the vendor to select the mats to be delivered. It was held that the sale was not complete, so as to pass the property.

In Shepley v. Davis, 5 Taunt. 617; 1 Com. Law Rep. 211, there was a sale of ten tons out of thirty tons of hemp, at a war-finger's. It remained to weigh the ten tons from the general mass, before they could be delivered. Held, that the sale was not complete, so as to pass the property.

In White v. Wilks, 5 Taunt. 176; 1 Com. Law Rep. 64, there was a sale of twenty tons of oil, out of a merchant's stock, consisting of several large quantities of oil, in divers cisterns, and in divers places. It remained to measure from the larger masses, the twenty tons sold, before they could be in a situation to be delivered. Here, also, I say nothing at present, as to what cisterns the twenty tons should be taken from. This sale was held not to be complete, to pass the property.

Thus, in some of these cases, it remained to ascertain even the price of the things sold; and in all of them, it remained to measure or to weigh the thing sold, before it could be delivered. In the case at Bar, nothing remained to be done for ascertaining the price or amount of purchase money; that was fixed by the terms of the contract itself; and the thing sold required neither to be weighed nor measured.

But, it is contended, that this case resembles Wallace v. Breeds, and comes within the influence of the general principle as to the thing sold not being in a deliverable situation, because the flour might require some coopering. But, in Wallace v. Breeds, it was certain at the time of the sale, that the thing sold was not then in a situation to be delivered; it was certain that it required the agency of a cooper to put it into that state; and the cooper was to be selected by the vendor. In this case, no agency of a cooper may have been necessary. It is only sometimes, that flour in store, requires any coopering; and when it does, the cooper is not then to be selected by the vendor; for, the usage of the trade, and consequently the implied contract of the parties, provides that the cooping, when any is necessary, shall be done by the warehouse-man, without any farther act to be done as between vendor and vendee. The cooping, under this usage, ought not to be considered as an act necessary to complete the sale, but merely as an act to be done, at the convenience and at the future request of the vendee. It is to the interest of the vendees that it should never be done till the flour is actually called for. And the acts of the parties in this case would seem to show that they so considered it. Ralston & Pleasants gave their check for the purchase money, (intending it as full payment,) in the same manner as if the sale were complete; and Pendleton insisted on no stipulation, fixing the time for delivering the flour, which he probably would have done, had it been considered that the flour was yet to be delivered, and that, in the mean time, it was at his risk.

But it is contended, that the property did not pass by the sale in this case, because the specific flour sold was not

it from the other flour with which it was mixed in the warehouse. This objection cannot, I presume, be intended to apply to any of the flour sold, except to that of the Pedlar and Rose brands. As to all the flour of the other brands, there was no other flour of those kinds in the warehouse, except the precise numbers mentioned in the order. Consequently, their identity and individuality were as fully ascertained as if they had been actually delivered. The objection, however, does apply to the flour of the Pedlar and Rose brands, there being two barrels of each of those brands more than the numbers called for in the order. And the question is, whether that circumstance shall prevent the sale from passing the property in the flour of those brands. It is true, that Chief Justice Mansfield said in Austen v. Craven, and in White v. Wilks, that the actions could not be supported, because the contracts of sale under which the property was claimed, attached to no specific quantity of oil in the one case, or of sugar in the other. And in Busk v. Davis, Lord Ellenborough, and some of the other Judges, spoke of the necessity of ascertaining the identity and individuality of the property. But it should always be borne in mind, that the expressions of Judges must be construed in reference to the circumstances of the cases to which they are applied. Austen v. Craven, was the sale of fifty hogsheads of sugar, of a particular quality, which were not in existence at the time of the contract; and if they had been in existence, yet as hogsheads of sugar are of no prescribed weight, it would have been necessary to weigh them, before the sale would be complete. White v. Wilks, was the sale of a smaller portion of oil, out of divers larger quantities. It was not only uncertain from which of the larger quantities the portion sold was to be taken, but if they had been ascertained, still the part sold was to be separated by measuring it from the larger quantity with which it was mixed. Busk v. Davis, was the sale of a quantity of flax, out of a 500 much *larger quantity, lying in mats, at a certain wharf. The sale was for so many tons, not so many mats; besides, the mats were of unequal weights. It was necessary to weigh the quantity sold, and to break some of the mats, to get the precise quantity sold, before the article sold could be delivered. In cases like these, where portions of a larger mass, liquid or solid, are sold, and where the portions sold must be weighed or measured, (which, of necessity, includes the idea of separating them from the general mass,) it may be said that the identity and individuality of the part sold, must be ascertained by actual separation from its kindred residue, before the sale will be complete to pass the property; or, in other words, before there can be a constructive delivery. But it by no means follows, that the same principle applies to cases where the things sold are not portions of a larger mass, to be separated by weighing or measuring, but consist of divers separate and individual things, all precisely of the same kind and value, mixed with divers other separate and individual things, which are also of the same kind and value, and between which and the things sold, there is no manner of difference whatever. There is no case of this kind to which the principle has been applied. On the contrary, it has been decided, that in such cases, no actual separation is necessary, even to support the action of Trover. Thus, in Jackson, and another v. Anderson, 4 Taunt. 24, J. Fielding, in Buenos Ayres, put 4,718 Spanish milled dollars into a barrel, and consigned them to Laycock & Co., of London, with directions to deliver 1,969 of them to Jackson & Co., that being the sum in which Fielding was indebted to them for goods consigned by them to him, and sold on their account. Laycock & Co. did not deliver the 1,969 dollars to Jackson & Co., but assigned the bill of lading for the barrel of dollars to Anderson, who sold all the dollars to the Bank of England. Jackson & Co. brought Trover against Anderson, for the 1,969 dollars. The defence was precisely the same that was made

Wilks, and Busk v. Davis, viz: that the action of Trover would lie only for specific property, and that the identity and individuality of the dollars sued for, had never been ascertained by actual separation from the others with which they were mixed. The defence, however, was overruled, and the Plaintiff obtained Judgment, on the ground expressly stated by Chief Justice Mansfield, "that as all the dollars were of the same value, it could not be a question which particular dollars were his." This remark applies to, and is decisive of, the case before us; for, it is expressly stated in the Record, that between barrels of fine flour, of the same mill brand, there is no difference whatever. Nor is it material that the property, in the case of Jackson v. Craven, was claimed under a bill of lading, and in the other cases, under a contract of sale. The action was Trover in all the cases, and there was no greater necessity for showing the identity and individuality of the property in the one set of cases, than in the other; yet the action was supported in the case where the things sued for were individual things of the same value, mixed with others of the same kind and value; and was not supported, where the action was not for individual things of the same kind, but for a portion of a larger mass, liquid or compound, which requires to be weighed or measured.

It is farther contended for the Appellant, that it was necessary to count the barrels before they could be delivered, and that the sale could not be complete to pass the property, until they were counted. But, I have not found any adjudication which countenances the idea, that the necessity to count the things sold, will produce that effect, in cases where the things sold are individual things, of the same value with each other, and with those with which they are mixed, and where the counting is not necessary for ascertaining the amount of the purchase money. In the case before us, the things sold were individual things, of the same value, so far at least as relates to the flour of the same brand; and no counting was necessary for ascertaining *the amount of the purchase money: that was fixed by the terms of the contract itself. The barrels, it is true, were to be counted. But so they must be in cases where a certain number is sold, at an agreed price, and where there are no more in the warehouse than the number sold. But, in such cases they are counted, merely to see that they are in the warehouse. And it would not be contended, I presume, that the necessity for counting in such cases, would prevent the property from passing. I admit, that if the sale had not specified the number of barrels, but had been of all the flour in the warehouse, or of all the flour of any particular brand, at so much per barrel, such a sale would not pass the property, until the barrels were counted; because, the counting would be necessary in that case for ascertaining the amount of the purchase money; and no sale can be complete till that is ascertained.

I am of opinion, that the usage of trade, stated in the Record, for flour in store to be sold by mere draft or order on the warehouse man, and to pass through many hands before it is called for, is entitled to great consideration. For, Commercial Law rests principally on usage; and the usages of trade are presumed to enter into the contemplation of the parties to a contract, and they are supposed to contract on their basis.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion, that there was a constructive delivery of the flour, which completed and executed the sale, and passed the right of property to Ralston & Pleasants. The flour therefore being theirs, was at their risk, and the loss of it by the accidental burning of the warehouse, must fall on them, and not on Pendleton. And as the check was given on the Bank of Virginia for the purchase money, did not avail Pendleton as a payment, (the check itself having been consumed by fire, and the payment of it countermanded by Ralston & Pleasants,) I think Pendleton is entitled to recover the purchase money in this action, and that the Judgment should be affirmed.

503 *THE PRESIDENT.

In considering this case, I have examined all the cases cited at the Bar, and also some others that were not noticed. It is a settled rule of the Common Law, that property in personal chattels passes only by actual delivery of the thing, except in cases in which some equivalent delivery is agreed upon by the parties, or is established by custom or usage, in which a virtual delivery is substituted for actual delivery of the thing. But, in these cases, unless the thing was in a condition to be delivered without more to be done by the vendor, either as regarded the price, or the quantity, as there could be no actual delivery until that was done by the vendor, so there can be no virtual delivery equivalent to it. And all the cases on the subject appear to me to have turned on the enquiry, whether, from the nature of the subject, it was, or was not, in a deliverable condition, that is, without more to be done by the vendor affecting the price or the quantity of the thing to be delivered. From some of the cases, it might be inferred, that identity of the thing was a pre-requisite to a virtual delivery of it; and I think there can be no doubt it is so, in every case in which the price or quantity is to be affected by what remains to be done to ascertain it. But, in a case in which identity is a matter of total indifference, both to the vendor and vendee, either as regards price or quantity, it is certainly of no importance. It is impossible to suppose, upon the facts stated in the Bill of Exceptions, that if Pendleton, the vendor, had separated the one hundred and nineteen barrels of flour from the one hundred and twenty-three, in pursuance of the terms of the order; that when he came to those of Pedlar's brand, or Rose's, it was of the slightest importance to him, or to the vendors, which two barrels of each brand were left out, as exceeding the number stated in the order. All of the same brand being of equal value, and being integral quantities, they were in a deliverable condition, without more to be done by the 504 vendor, *which could affect either price or quantity. Every thing necessary to be done, to give to the vendees the actual possession of the flour, could be done by the keeper of the warehouse as well as by Pendleton, and the order under the custom, which is stated in the Bill of Exceptions, I think, virtually passed the possession of the one hundred and nineteen barrels to the vendees. The case of Whitehouse v. Frost, 12 East. 614. went a step farther than this. In that case, ten tons of oil were sold, and an order given to deliver it to the purchasers, out of forty tons then lying in one cistern in the oil-house in Liverpool; there was nothing to distinguish the ten tons from any other ten tons of the forty in the cistern; there was nothing like identity; quantity and price were alone ascertained; all the particles of the oil were mingled together in one mass; there were no integral quantities of equal value, distinct and separate from the whole mass, of which actual or virtual delivery might be made; until the oil was measured out, and the ten tons separated from the mass, this could not be predicated of it, and yet the Court held that the property passed to the vendees. I know that this case was condemned by many of the Judges afterwards, as having gone too far; but it is clearly distinguishable from the one before us. When that case was pressed upon the Court in the case of Craven v. Austin, 4 Taunt., Heth, Justice, asked, if ten tons had leaked out of the cistern, to whom would they be deemed to belong: and Mansfield, Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said it was unlike other cases, and must stand on its own bottom.

In the case of Busk v. Davis, 2 Mau. & Selw. ten tons of flax were sold, to be taken out of eighteen tons put up in mats; the order for it had been accepted and entered in the wharfinger's books, but that, Lord Ellenborough said, was not sufficient: further acts were necessary, for the flax was to be weighed, and the portion of the entire bulk to be delivered, was to be ascertained, and it might be necessary to break open some mats to make up the 505 quantity *agreed upon. If in that case the flax had been in mats of equal quantity, and value, the first ascertained by the inspection of a public officer, and the latter by the facts in the case, as in the case of the flour, it is not to be inferred from the language of Lord Ellenborough, or any other Judge, that it would have been held that the property did not pass; but the contrary. The case of Jackson and another v. Anderson and another, 4 Taunt. is a case, in which identity of the thing, in which property was claimed by the Plaintiffs, was not pretended. The 1,969 dollars consigned to Jackson & Co. by Fielding, the shipper, were never separated from, nor counted out from the 4,718 dollars shipped to Laycock & Co. and transferred by them to Anderson, and yet it was held that the property in the 1,969 dollars passed to Jackson & Co. the Plaintiffs, and that they could maintain Trover for them. They were separate quantities of the same value, and were as little distinguishable from other dollars in the same barrel, as the sixty-two barrels of flour of Pedlar's brand, and the two barrels of Rose's brand, from what would remain if those brands, in the case before us. In that case, they held that the property passed, though the bill of lading would have been satisfied by the delivery of any dollars to the amount of 1,969. and property in any specific 1,969 dollars could not be said to be vested in the Plaintiffs. The order for the flour, in our case, could not have been satisfied by the delivery of any flour, even of the same inspections, and brands, except that which was in the warehouse when that order was given; from that moment, the one hundred and nineteen barrels of fine flour, of the marks and brands specified in the order, became the property of the vendees: all that was material to them was, that the flour described in the order was in the warehouse, to be counted out to them when called for. If the vendor had not owned another barrel there except the one hundred and nineteen barrels specified in the order, it could not be doubted that his property in the one hundred and nineteen barrels passed 506 *to the vendees though it might be to be counted out of flour of the same description, belonging to others. As it had not been questioned that the flour of all the brands described in the order, except Pedlar's and Rose's, passed to the vendees, that sixty-two barrels of the first, and two of the latter were to be counted out of sixty-four in the one case, and four in the other, cannot vary the case: whether it was to be counted out of flour belonging to others or to the vendor, was not material. The rule, I know, has been laid down, that where any thing remains to be done to ascertain the price, the quantity, or the thing, the property does not pass. In the case before us, price and quantity were ascertained; and as to the thing, nothing more is meant than the kind of thing, wherever from the nature of it, it cannot be identified, and distinguished from things of the same kind and value, as in the case of the dollars in Jackson v. Anderson, and of the flour in the case before us.

With regard to the cooperage, which might not be necessary, and the price of storage, as it was the custom to charge both to the vendor, neither can affect the question.

I think, therefore, that the instruction of the Judge to the Jury was correct, and that the Judgment must be affirmed.

I. SALES DISTINGUISHED FROM OTHER TRANSACTIONS.

1. FROM BAILMENTS.—The distinction between a bailment and a sale is that when the identical thing delivered is to be returned, though in an altered form, the contract is one of bailment, and the title to the property is not changed. But when there is no obligation to return the specific article either in kind or identity, and the receiver is at liberty to return another thing of equal value, he becomes debtor to make the return, the title to the property is changed, and the transaction is a sale. Reherd v. Clem, 86 Va. 374, 10 S. E. Rep. 504.

But in an early case it was held that where wheat is delivered at a mill to be ground, upon an agreement that the miller shall return to the farmer a given quantity of flour for so many bushels of wheat, the miller is a bailee and not a purchaser, notwithstanding the fact that the miller is not bound to return flour made from that identical wheat, but flour of a certain quality made from any wheat in the mill. Slaughter v. Green, 1 Rand. 3, 10 Am. Dec. 488, and note, where this decision is reviewed and criticised. In Smith v. Clark, 2 Wend. 85, the court said that Slaughter v. Green, 1 Rand. 3, was a hard case, and has made a bad precedent.

2. FROM HIRING.—The principal difference between a sale and a hiring is that in the former case the owner parts with the whole proprietary interest in the thing, while in the latter he parts with it only for a temporary use and purpose. In a sale the thing itself is the object of the contract; in a hiring, the use alone is its object. Baldwin v. Van Wagner, 33 W. Va. 293, 10 S. E. Rep. 716.

3. FROM GIFTS.—A gift is a contract without consideration. But a sale is a contract for a valuable consideration paid or stipulated; though sales may be inferred from the circumstances without express proof of any consideration. Monographic note on "Gifts," appended to Barker v. Barker, 2 Gratt. 344; Hansbrough v. Thom, 3 Leigh 147.

4. FROM CONSIGNMENTS.—In determining whether the agreement between the parties constitutes the relation of consignor and consignee, or that of seller and buyer, the court looks beyond mere names and within to see the real nature of the agreement, and determines from all its provisions taken together. If the agreement is in substance and effect a sale, it must be so declared, no matter by what name the parties choose to designate it. Arbuckle v. Gates, 95 Va. 802, 30 S. E. Rep. 496.

For example, where the consignee of goods may sell them upon terms to be fixed by himself, and there is no provision for the return of any goods that may not be sold, but he is bound to pay the consignor a fixed price for the goods at a fixed time, regardless of whether they have been sold or not, or whether the proceeds of sale have been collected or not, such transaction constitutes a sale and not an agency. Arbuckle v. Gates, 95 Va. 802, 30 S. E. Rep. 496.

II. CONTRACT OF SALE.

1. MUTUAL AGREEMENT.—To constitute a sale of personal property, there must be a mutual agreement on the part of the seller to sell and of the buyer to buy. Bartholomae v. Paull, 18 W. Va. 771.

This agreement, however, need not be express, but it may be implied from the language or conduct of the parties. Bartholomae v. Paull, 18 W. Va. 771.

It is essential to the force and efficacy of every contract of sale that the buyer and seller should mutually contemplate the same subject matter of sale, therefore where a merchant orders goods of a certain kind and style, and the party to whom the order is given undertakes to fill it by delivering goods of a different kind and style, the merchant ordering the goods may refuse to receive them, on the ground that the goods delivered are not the goods ordered. Haxall v. Willis, 15 Gratt. 450.

But if the buyer, notwithstanding the want of correspondence between the goods ordered and sent, accepts and treats them as a compliance with his order, he cannot afterwards, as a general rule, set up any want of correspondence, to defeat the seller's right to recover the price. Haxall v. Willis, 15 Gratt. 451.

2. OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE.—Where an agent, having full authority to sell an article at a price named, offers the article at that price, and the offer is accepted unconditionally, this completes the contract of sale between the parties, without confirmation by the principal, or communication of such confirmation to the purchaser. Insurance Co. v. Gamble, 94 Va. 622, 37 S. E. Rep. 463.

In order to constitute a complete sale there must be a distinct act of acceptance on the part of the buyer. Bartholomae v. Paull, 18 W. Va. 771.

III. SUBJECTS OF SALE.

1. EXISTENCE OF THING SOLD.—Personal property to be the subject of sale, must have an existence; but it need not have, in every sense, a perfect, tangible existence, to be regarded in law as capable of ownership; but a potential existence is sufficient. For example, a man may not sell the fruit from trees, or wool or lambs from sheep, which he has not; but he may do so if he then owns the trees or sheep. Their ownership gives potential existence to the fruit and wool and lambs, though as yet the trees have not blossomed, or the wool grown, or the ewes become pregnant. Wiant v. Hays, 38 W. Va. 681, 18 S. E. Rep. 807. See Braxton v. Bell, 92 Va. 229, 23 S. E. Rep. 289.

a. Expectant Interests.—The actual adult owner of a vested expectant interest in property, whether in reversion or remainder, may sell such interest, and the sale will be binding on him, in the absence of fraud or imposition on the part of the purchaser. Cribbins v. Markwood, 13 Gratt. 495, 67 Am. Dec. 775.

But equity extends a very anxious protection to persons selling expectant interests, although they do not stand in the relation of expectant heirs, and trivial circumstances, added to inadequacy of price, will be sufficient to set aside such sales. McKinney v. Pinckard, 2 Leigh 149, 21 Am. Dec. 601.

b. Possibilities.—A mere contingent possibility, not coupled with an interest, is not the subject of sale, as all the wool one shall ever have, or the sheep which a lessee was covenanted to leave at the end of an existing term. But if rights are vested, or possibilities are distinctly connected with interest or property, they may be sold. Wiant v. Hays, 38 W. Va. 681, 18 S. E. Rep. 807.

IV. WHEN TITLE PASSES.

1. INTENTION GOVERNS.—The main inquiry in determining whether the title has or has not passed by the contract is: what was the intention of the parties? The intention of the parties in a contract of this character is the agreement, for it will not be denied by any one that the parties can expressly agree that the articles purchased shall pass at once to the buyer, although they are to be measured, weighed or counted, and the price is to be precisely ascertained and paid in the future. See Morgan v. King, 28 W. Va. 14.

The question whether a sale of personal property is complete or only executory, is to be determined from the intent of the parties as gathered from their contract, the situation of the thing sold, and the circumstances surrounding the sale. Morgan v. King, 28 W. Va. 1; Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910; Osborne v. Francis, 38 W. Va. 312, 18 S. E. Rep. 691, 45 Am. St. Rep. 859.

2. UNCONDITIONAL SALE OF CHATTELS.—But where there is an executed sale of an interest in property, without reservation, the title passes immediately upon the sale to the buyer, and, therefore, it is unnecessary for the seller to allege, in an action on the contract, that he has transferred his interest. Smith v. Burton, 94 Va. 158, 26 S. E. Rep. 412.

Where a bill of sale is executed from one person to another, for a steamboat, and delivery and possession accompanies the act, thereby rendering the sale complete, there is no such right of ownership or title in the seller as would authorize one of his creditors to attach the boat. Hobbs v. Steamboat Interchange, 1 W. Va. 57.

3. SOMETHING REMAINING TO BE DONE.

a. In General.—Where anything remains to be done by the seller as between him and the buyer essential to put the goods sold in a deliverable state; or where anything remains to be done by the seller for the purpose of ascertaining the price of the goods, as weighing, testing or measuring them, where the price is to depend upon the quantity or quality of the goods, the performance of these things, in the absence of anything indicating a contrary intent, is a condition precedent to the transfer of the property, and therefore, in the meantime, the goods remain at the risk of the seller. These principles are known as LORD BLACKBURN'S first and second rules. Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, 18 Am. Dec. 726; Dixon v. Myers, 7 Gratt. 240; Morgan v. King, 28 W. Va. 1; Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910.

On the other hand, where there is a contract for an immediate sale, and nothing remains to be done by the seller as between him and the buyer, the seller immediately acquires a property in the price, and the buyer a property in the goods, and then all the consequences resulting from the vesting of the property follow, one of which is, that if it be destroyed the loss falls upon the buyer. Chapman v. Campbell, 13 Gratt. 106; Hobbs v. The Steamboat Interchange, 1 W. Va. 57.

For example, when logs are delivered, measured and branded with the brand of the purchaser, at the point or place of delivery in strict accordance with the unequivocal stipulations of the written contract of purchase, the sale is complete, and the title passes and vests in the purchaser, notwithstanding other provisions in such written contract by which the seller agrees for a fixed compensation safely and without loss or damage to deliver such logs at another different point for the purchaser. Bank of Huntington v. Napier, 41 W. Va. 481, 23 S. E. Rep. 800.

Co-ownership and Warehouse Rent.—So also, where there is a usage, when barrels of flour are delivered by a warehouseman to a purchaser, to charge co-ownership and warehouse rent to the seller, neither of these things shows anything farther to be done by the seller, nor any obstacle to the delivery of the flour. Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, 18 Am. Dec. 726.

Rule Where Goods Are Actually Delivered.—But where there has been an actual change in the possession and custody of the thing bargained for, the rule is essentially different. In other words, where the subject matter of the contract has not only been completely ascertained and identified, but actually delivered, the mere fact that the weighing, counting or measuring, is yet to be done by the buyer, simply in order to ascertain the aggregate sum of money which he is to pay as the price, does not of itself show such a defect in the transfer of the title as may prevent the risk of the loss from being cast on the buyer. Haxall v. Willis, 15 Gratt. 434.

b. Part of Uniform Mass.—When the subject matter of the sale is part of an ascertained mass of uniform quality and value, no separation is necessary to vest title in the purchaser to the part sold. Thus, separation is unnecessary to pass the title to a number of barrels of flour sold out of a larger number of the same brand, quality and price. Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, 18 Am. Dec. 726.

For example, where there is a sale of a specified number of barrels of flour lying in a certain warehouse, the barrels having on them different brands, and the buyer gives a check in payment, and the seller gives to the buyer a bill of parcels, specifying the number of barrels of each brand, and an order on the warehouseman for the flour, and a receipt in full for the price of the flour, this is a complete and executed contract, and the title passes to the buyer so that if the property is destroyed before actual delivery, the loss falls on the buyer. Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, 18 Am. Dec. 726.

(1) Sale of Nonspecific Goods.—Where the subject of the sale is nonspecific goods, the property does not pass until an appropriation of the specific goods has been made with the assent of both seller and buyer. American Hide, etc., Co. v. Chalkley, 101 Va. 458, 44 S. E. Rep. 705.

It has been held, however, that where the seller delivers nonspecific goods, such as salt to be made, to the person authorized by the buyer to receive it, this vests title in the buyer and he may maintain trover to recover it from a third person who wrongfully converts it to his own use. Lewis v. Arnold, 18 Gratt. 454.

(2) Goods Sufficiently Designated.—Where goods sold are sufficiently designated, so that no question can arise as to the thing intended, it is not absolutely necessary that there should be a delivery, or that the goods should be in a deliverable condition, or that the quality or quantity, when the price depends upon either or both, should be determined; these are circumstances indicating the intent but are not conclusive. Morgan v. King, 28 W. Va. 1. Approved in Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910.

But where there is a sale of goods generally, but neither the goods sold, nor the mass itself out of which the goods sold are to be taken, is ascertained or designated, no title to the property vests in the purchaser till delivery, because until then the very goods sold are not ascertained. State v. Hughes, 23 W. Va. 347.

Nor does the title to property vest in the buyer upon the signing and delivering of a contract of the following purport: "I have this day sold to B. all my Swiss cheese now in my cellars, between 80 and 90 loaves (this does not include cracked or second-class cheese), at 12½ cents per pound; the cheese to be paid for when received; the second grade cheese to be 10½ cents per lb.; B. to pay ¼ freight from F., and to have all out of the cellars before Jan'y 1, 1886;" the contract being dated and delivered October 27, 1884. Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910.

Pleasants v. Pendleton has been cited frequently by the courts in other states of the union, but it has by no means met with universal approval. It was cited with approval in Kimberly v. Patchin, 19 N. Y. 336, 75 Am. Dec. 339; Watts v. Hendry, 18 Fla. 523; Kingman v. Hohenquist (Kan.), 59 Am. Rep. 606. Hurff v. Hires, 11 Vroom (N. J.) 593. But in Woods v. McGee, 7 Ohio Rep. part II, p. 127, 30 Am. Dec. 203, the court, after laying down the general rule that where a part of an undivided mass of property is sold, it is necessary that some further act should be done, specifying and identifying the part sold before the action of trover will lie, said: "The case of Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, is however, a very strong case the other way. But it is impossible to hide from one's self, that the fact of the small difference between one hundred and twenty-three barrels, the whole quantity, and one hundred and nineteen barrels, the number sold, may have gone a great way to influence the judgment. It was a hard case and hard cases always make a shipwreck of principles. It is impossible to answer the difficult inquiry. If a part only of the flour had been burnt in that case, on whom would the loss have fallen?"

And in Ferguson v. Northern Bank (Ky.), 29 Am. Rep. 424, the court said: "The case of Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, decided in the year 1823, has been cited as a strong case in support of Kimberly v. Patchin, but on an examination of that case it will be found that not one of the barrels of flour in the warehouse was branded like the one hundred and nineteen barrels claimed by the plaintiff, and it was there expressly held that the subject of the bargain was so designated as to be clearly distinguishable." The case of Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, is also disapproved in Hutchinson v. Hunter, 7 Pa. St. 145.

4. PAYMENT OF PURCHASE PRICE.—Where payment of the purchase price is a condition precedent in a contract of sale, the title to the property does not pass to the buyer until that is done. Freeport Stone Co. v. Carey, 42 W. Va. 276, 26 S. E. Rep. 188.

Thus, although every thing the seller has to do has been done, such as marking, measuring and weighing the goods, so that the title vests in the buyer, yet the seller is not required to part with the goods until he is paid for them, and he has a lien upon the goods for the price so long as they remain in his possession; nor does part payment destroy his lien. Curtin v. Isaacsen, 36 W. Va. 391, 15 S. E. Rep. 171.

Waiver of Payment.—But an absolute and unconditional delivery is regarded as a waiver of the condition. For example, where a sale is conditioned upon full payment on delivery of the property, an acceptance of a partial payment, with no express agreement as to credit, is a waiver of the condition. Freeport Stone Co. v. Carey, 42 W. Va. 276, 26 S. E. Rep. 188.

Sale on Credit.—Moreover, a sale may be just as binding if made on credit as if made for ready money; and in such case the buyer may bring his action at once against the seller for refusing to deliver the property, without making any tender of the price. Chapman v. Campbell, 18 Gratt. 105.

V. DELIVERY OF GOODS.

1. DUTY TO DELIVER.—As soon as a contract for the sale of a chattel is completed, the seller, in the absence of a contrary indication or agreement, must deliver the property to the buyer when the latter has paid the consideration money. See Chapman v. Campbell, 18 Gratt. 110.

2. TIME OF DELIVERY.—As to the time of delivery, the law supposes, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, a reasonable time, unless a definite time is fixed by agreement. But if a definite time was set, this is of the essence of the contract as between the parties. Greenbrier Lumber Co. v. Ward, 36 W. Va. 573, 15 S. E. Rep. 80; Boyd v. Gunnison, 14 W. Va. 1. For example, where no time was fixed in a contract for the delivery of oil, it was held that the buyer could not, without the consent of the seller, extend the delivery of any part of the oil beyond a reasonable time. Boyd v. Gunnison, 14 W. Va. 1.

And where fruit trees are bought to be delivered in the fall, the buyer may refuse to accept them unless they are delivered in that part of the season properly suited for transplanting such trees. Weltner v. Riggs, 8 W. Va. 445.

Delivery by Installments.—But where the seller agrees to deliver the articles sold as fast as a certain party delivers them to him, the buyer cannot set a time within which the seller must complete the delivery or be deemed guilty of a breach of contract, so as to entitle such buyer to purchase the residue in market, and recover of the seller the difference between the market price and the sale price. Smith v. Snyder, 83 Va. 614; Smith v. Snyder, 77 Va. 432.

Postponement by Request of Buyer.—Where, in a contract of sale, delivery is postponed at the buyer's request and the contract is ultimately broken, this has the effect of postponing the date of breach, and therefore alters the time with reference to which damages are to be fixed. Smith v. Snyder, 77 Va. 432.

Notice of Time of Delivery.—Where no day is specified as the time of delivery, but it is to be designated by the seller, he must give the buyer reasonable notice thereof. Weltner v. Riggs, 8 W. Va. 445; Smith v. Snyder, 77 Va. 442.

3. PLACE OF DELIVERY.—Where a contract for the sale of personal property names several places at which the property may be delivered, at the buyer's option, the buyer must within a reasonable time make his selection of the place of delivery. Boyd v. Gunnison, 14 W. Va. 1.

In Boyd v. Gunnison, 14 W. Va. 1, the contract was made on the 30th of March, 1868, for the sale of 2000 barrels of oil, the contract giving the buyer the right to select one of three places mentioned in the contract for the delivery of the oil, and on the 9th of April, 1868, the buyer selected the city of New York, one of the places mentioned in the contract, as the place of delivery. It was held that the selection was made in a reasonable time.

4. QUANTITY TO BE DELIVERED.—As to the quantity which the seller is bound to deliver, this depends, of course, upon the terms of the contract; therefore, if the quantity to be delivered is fixed by the agreement, the seller must deliver just what he bargained to deliver,—no more, no less; nor can the seller generally deliver a quantity in excess of that ordered: Greenbrier Lumber Co. v. Ward, 36 W. Va. 573, 15 S. E. Rep. 89.

If, on the other hand, the quantity delivered is less than that sold, it may be refused by the buyer; and if the contract be for a specified quantity, to be delivered in parcels from time to time, the buyer may return the parcels first received if the later deliveries be not made, for the contract is not performed by the seller's delivery of less than the whole quantity sold. Greenbrier Lumber Co. v. Ward, 36 W. Va. 573, 15 S. E. Rep. 89.

5. SYMBOLICAL OR CONSTRUCTIVE DELIVERY.—Actual delivery is not necessary to pass the title to the buyer and put the goods at his risk; a constructive or symbolical delivery, as by delivering the key of the warehouse in which the goods are deposited, is sufficient to pass them to the buyer. Pleasants v. Pendleton, 6 Rand. 473, 18 Am. Dec. 726.

6. DELIVERY TO CARRIER.—Where a seller delivers goods to a carrier by order of the purchaser, the delivery to the carrier is delivery to the purchaser, and the property vests immediately on its delivery to the carrier; and, therefore, the place of sale is necessarily the residence of the seller, whence the goods were shipped. State v. Hughes, 22 W. Va. 743; Boyd v. Pollock, 27 W. Va. 139; Ford v. Friedman, 40 W. Va. 177, 30 S. E. Rep. 930.

If goods are sold to a buyer to be delivered at a depot in a certain city, or to be delivered in the cars at the depot in that city, the goods remain at the risk of the seller, until they arrive at the depot in such city, but upon their arrival at the depot in such city, without being unloaded and without any notice of their arrival at the depot, they at once become the property of the buyer and are thenceforth at his risk. Boyd v. Pollock, 27 W. Va. 75.

7. PROPERTY NOT IN POSSESSION OF SELLER.—The completeness and efficacy of a sale are not necessarily affected by the consideration that the property is not in the actual possession of the seller, or if in his possession, is not to be immediately delivered. There is no principle of law which establishes that a sale of personal goods is invalid because they are not in the possession of the owner. The sale of a chattel in the possession of a third party, claiming no adverse title, is not the transfer of a right of action, but is a sale of the thing itself. Chapman v. Campbell, 13 Gratt. 105.

In Chapman v. Campbell, 13 Gratt. 105, a slave on trial for larceny before a county court was sold, but before he was discharged he made his escape and was not heard of again. It was held that the contract of sale was complete, and the buyer bound for the price, though the slave was not and could not be delivered.

8. EXCUSE FOR NONDELIVERY.—Inability to perform a contract, caused by the seller's default, will not excuse a failure to deliver the goods according to the contract. Richmond Ice Co. v. Crystal Ice Co., 99 Va. 285, 38 S. E. Rep. 141.

Injunction against Delivery.—But where the non-delivery of property contracted to be sold is due to the fact that the seller was enjoined from selling and delivering the property, the seller, in an action on the contract to recover the price, may show such injunction proceedings by producing a certified copy of the record. Cogar v. Burns Lumber Co., 46 W. Va. 256, 33 S. E. Rep. 319.

9. REMEDIES OF BUYER FOR NONDELIVERY OF GOODS.

a. In General.—As soon as the contract of sale is completed, the buyer has a right to demand the thing sold immediately, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary; therefore, if he tenders the purchase money and demands the property, he may maintain detinue or trover if the delivery be refused. Chapman v. Campbell, 13 Gratt. 110.

b. Accrual of Cause of Action.—And where the seller refuses to perform his contract to sell and deliver goods the buyer may sue immediately for damages, without waiting for the time of performance to expire. Davis v. Grand Rapids School Furniture Co., 41 W. Va. 717, 24 S. E. Rep. 630.

c. Measure of Damages.

(1) In General.—The proper measure of damages for the breach of an executory contract to deliver goods, is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery, with interest thereon until paid. Boyd v. Gunnison, 14 W. Va. 1; Perry Tie, etc., Co. v. Reynolds, 100 Va. 264, 40 S. E. Rep. 919; Trigg v. Clay, 88 Va. 330, 13 S. E. Rep. 434, 29 Am. S. Rep. 723; Smith v. Snyder, 82 Va. 614; Newbrought v. Walker, 8 Gratt. 16; Richmond Ice Co. v. Crystal Ice Co., 99 Va. 285, 38 S. E. Rep. 141; Nottingham Coal, etc., Co. v. Preas, 102 Va. 820, 47 S. E. Rep. 823.

(2) Stock Sales.—And the same rule applies in contracts for the sale and delivery of stock. Bull v. Douglas, 4 Munf. 303, 6 Am. Dec. 518; Enders v. Board of Public Works, 1 Gratt. 364.

(3) Limitation of Rule.—But the rule that the measure of damages, for failure of the seller to deliver goods as agreed, is the difference between the contract price and the market price of the article at the time of the breach, proceeds upon the assumption that the buyer can go into the market and obtain the article contracted for at that price. Therefore, when the circumstances of the case are such that the buyer cannot go into the market and supply himself with the article, the rule does not apply, for the reason of it has ceased. Davis v. Grand Rapids School Furniture Co., 41 W. Va. 717, 24 S. E. Rep. 630. It has been held, where the seller breaks his contract to furnish goods which have been resold by the buyer before delivery, when similar goods cannot be purchased in the market, that the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the price at which they have been resold. Trigg v. Clay, 88 Va. 330, 13 S. E. Rep. 434, 29 Am. St. Rep. 723.

But in order for the buyer to recover as damages the difference between the market price and contract price at the time and place of delivery, it is not necessary that he should have actually gone into the market and bought other goods to supply the place of those not delivered. Nottingham Coal, etc., Co. v. Preas, 102 Va. 820, 47 S. E. Rep. 823.

(4) Absence of Market Value at Place of Delivery.—If there is no market price for the property at the time and place of delivery, the value of the property may be ascertained by showing its market price in other places, in the vicinity of the place of delivery, at or about the time of delivery. McCormick v. Hamilton, 23 Gratt. 561; Nottingham Coal, etc., Co. v. Preas, 102 Va. 830, 47 S. E. Rep. 833.

(5) Proof of Market Value.—In ascertaining what is the market value of personal property and the day of delivery at a certain place, it is proper to hear evidence as to the market value of the article within a reasonable time both before and after the day of delivery. Boyd v. Gunnison, 14 W. Va. 1.

(6) Special Damages.—The general rule is that the party injured by a breach of contract, is entitled to recover all his damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained, provided they are certain, and such as might naturally be expected to follow the breach. It is only uncertain and contingent profits, therefore, which the law excludes; not such as being the immediate and necessary result of the breach of contract, may be fairly supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made it and are capable of being definitely ascertained by reference to established market rates. James v. Adams, 8 W. Va. 568; Newbrough v. Walker, 8 Gratt. 16; Trigg v. Clay, 88 Va. 330, 13 S. E. Rep. 484, 29 Am. St. Rep. 723.

Contract Contemplating Resale.—Where a seller contracts to sell and deliver goods within a specified time, knowing at the time that the buyer has agreed to deliver the same to a subpurchaser at a fixed date, and the seller fails to deliver in time, he is liable to his buyer for the loss of profits which the latter would have made on a resale to the subpurchaser if the seller had fulfilled his contract, and for damages which the buyer was compelled to pay to the subpurchaser caused by the failure of the seller to deliver the goods within the time agreed upon, when the profits and damages paid are reasonable. Perry Tie, etc., Co. v. Reynolds, 100 Va. 264, 40 S. E. Rep. 919.

Demurrage and Dead Freight Paid by Buyer.—So also, where a buyer of goods made a charter party, agreeing to pay demurrage for delay beyond the time specified for delivery, and also for the payment of dead freight, and he was compelled to pay both in consequence of the seller's failure to deliver the goods within the time and in the quantity stipulated for, it was held that the buyer could recover from the seller the amount paid as demurrage and dead freight, especially when the vessel during the delay, was not used for other purposes, but kept waiting at the point of delivery ready to receive the goods, because of the assurance and representations of the seller that they would be delivered in a short time. Perry Tie, etc., Co. v. Reynolds, 100 Va. 264, 40 S. E. Rep. 919.

VI. RIGHTS OF BUYER.

1. INSPECTION.—Where a contract for the sale of goods provided that the buyer might inspect them before paying the purchase money, but that all disputes should be arbitrated, it was held that if the buyer, after inspecting the goods, rejects them without submitting the question of quality to arbitration, the seller might receive back the goods without being liable for damages because of their quality. Baer's Sons Grocer Co. v. Cutting Fruit Packing Co., 42 W. Va. 350, 26 S. E. Rep. 191.

The maxim caveat emptor does not apply to a sale of goods where the buyer has no opportunity for inspection. Hood v. Bloch, 29 W. Va. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 910.

2. RESCISSION.—A buyer of goods who has the right to rescind a contract of sale, must rescind in toto; he cannot keep part of the goods, and return the remainder, without becoming liable for the whole. Manass-Bruning Mfg. Co. Prince, 51 W. Va. 510, 41 S. E. Rep. 907.

A purchaser of goods cannot keep a part of them, and return the remainder, and defeat payment for them according to the contract on the ground that the part returned were not of the agreed quality or make. Manass-Bruning Mfg. Co. v. Prince, 51 W. Va. 510, 41 S. E. Rep. 907. See monographic note on "Rescission, Cancellation and Reformation," appended to Chamberlaine v. Marsh, 6 Munf. 283.

VII. STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

In case of a sale of personal property not executed by delivery, but to be consummated by a delivery at another place, although in consequence of earnings paid, or otherwise, the property is so vested in the buyer that on complying or offering to comply with the contract on his part, he may recover the sum from the seller or his agent; yet, until delivery, and while the goods are in transitu, the seller may, on the buyer becoming bankrupt, or being likely to be so, arrest the goods, or order his agent to arrest them, which order, operating as an indemnity to the agent in addition to that arising from his possession of the goods, will be his guarantee for refusing to deliver them, though the agent might, under circumstances, also have a right to demand other security from his principal, which it would be incumbent on him forthwith to give, under pain of a right in the agent to go on and execute the contract by delivery. Howatt v. Davis, 5 Munf. 34.

And if a factor or agent, having sold goods belonging to his principal, be ordered by him while they are yet in transitu not to deliver them to the buyer, of whose solvency doubts are entertained, but he delivers them notwithstanding such order, and without demanding security for his indemnity, the principal is entitled to an action against him in case the buyer should prove insolvent. Howatt v. Davis, 5 Munf. 34.

VIII. ACCEPTANCE OF GOODS.

1. DUTY TO ACCEPT.—If the goods ordered and the goods sent correspond in quality and quantity, the buyer is bound to accept them, and if he refuses, the rights and remedies of the seller are just as complete as if there had been a full and formal acceptance, and he may maintain an action on the contract against the buyer for the damages he has sustained for the failure of the buyer to comply with his contract. Bartholomae v. Paull, 18 W. Va. 771; Haxall v. Willis, 15 Gratt. 451; McCormick v. Hamilton, 23 Gratt. 561.

2. UNREASONABLE DELAY.—Moreover, if the buyer delays unreasonably in accepting the goods, he is liable for damages sustained by the seller, although guilty of no deception or fraud. Alleghany Iron Co. v. Teaford, 96 Va. 372, 31 S. E. Rep. 525.

3. AGENT MAY ACCEPT FOR HIS PRINCIPAL.—Proctor v. Spratley, 78 Va. 264.

4. DELAY IN REJECTION.—A sale will be implied, where the person receiving the goods does not within a reasonable time repel the implication by returning the goods or notifying the seller that he will not accept them, and this whether he ordered the goods or not. Bartholomae v. Paull, 18 W. Va. 771; Thompson v. Douglass, 35 W. Va. 337; 13 S. E. Rep. 1015.

Question of Fact.—But what is a reasonable time for a buyer to return goods or notify the seller that he will accept them, is a question of fact to be determined by the jury according to the circumstances of each case. Bartholomae v. Paull, 18 W. Va. 771; Thompson v. Douglass, 35 W. Va. 337, 13 S. E. Rep. 1015.

5. ACTS OF OWNERSHIP.

a. In General.—Receipt of goods by a buyer will not be a binding acceptance if any act be done by the buyer which he would have no right to do unless he were the owner of the goods. Manss-Bruning Shoe Mfg. Co. v. Prince, 51 W. Va. 510, 41 S. E. Rep. 907. See post, this note, "Sales by Sample." For example, although goods are not ordered, still a sale will be implied, where he receives them and deals with them as his own, or treats them in a way inconsistent with a recognition of another's ownership. Bartholomae v. Paull, 18 W. Va. 771; Thompson v. Douglass, 35 W. Va. 337, 13 S. E. Rep. 1015.

Likewise, although a buyer of goods countermands his order because they are delivered after the stipulated date, he must nevertheless pay for them, if he takes them from the railroad depot to his store, opens the boxes containing them, and examines them or does any act which only an owner can do. Manss-Bruning Mfg. Co. v. Prince, 51 W. Va. 510, 41 S. E. Rep. 907.

b. Permitting Third Person to Convert Goods.—Where one send goods to another, and the latter disclaims to have purchased them, but permits a third person to take them and convert them to his own use, this will make him liable as purchaser, although he may have allowed them to be taken by mistake. Bartholomae v. Paull, 18 W. Va. 771; Thompson v. Douglass, 35 W. Va. 337, 13 S. E. Rep. 1015.

6. ACCEPTANCE AS WAIVER OF LATE DELIVERY.—Where goods are delivered after the stipulated date, the buyer must absolutely refuse to accept them if he wishes to insist upon the lateness of delivery, therefore, if he receives them and exercises acts of ownership over them, as by paying freight, taking the goods from the depot and examining them, or, a fortiori, by paying the price, he will be held to have waived the objection that the goods had come behind time. Manss-Bruning Shoe Mfg. Co. v. Prince, 51 W. Va. 510, 41 S. E. Rep. 907; Reid v. Field, 33 Va. 26, 1 S. E. Rep. 395.

Where the goods ordered are shipped so late in the season that the buyer refuses to accept them, and the seller replies offering to give the buyer an extra credit if he will accept them, but the buyer does not in any way reply to such offer in a reasonable time, and does not reship or in any way attempt to return the goods to the seller, the buyer will be presumed to have assented to the seller's offer, and to have accepted the goods. Ford v. Friedman, 40 W. Va. 177, 20 S. E. Rep. 930.

But an acceptance by the buyer of goods delivered at a time subsequent to that named in the contract for the delivery does not constitute a waiver of the buyer's claim for damages arising from the delay, especially when the conduct of the parties shows an intention on the buyer's part not to waive his rights to such damages. Perry Tie, etc., Co. v. Reynolds, 100 Va. 264, 40 S. E. Rep. 919.

7. REMEDIES OF SELLER FOR NONACCEPTANCE OF GOODS.

Where Contract Is Executory.—Where a contract of sale is executory, and the title and possession still remain in the seller, his remedy against the buyer, who wrongfully refuses to pay for and accept the goods, is an action of assumpsit on a special count to recover damages for the breach of the contract. American Hide, etc., Co. v. Chalkley, 101 Va. 458, 44 S. E. Rep. 703.

Where Contract Is Executed.—But where the title has passed, and the buyer refuses to pay for the goods, the remedy of the seller is an action for the agreed price. American Hide, etc., Co. v. Chalkley, 101 Va. 458, 44 S. E. Rep. 703.

If the buyer of goods refuses to accept them when tendered according to the contract of sale, the seller may elect to rescind the contract and keep or dispose of the goods for his own use, or to let it remain in full force and hold the buyer liable for the price of the goods and all damages arising from this breach of the contract. If he elects to let the contract remain in full force, he may either bring his action for the price of the goods when it is due and payable, or he may sell the goods, applying the net proceeds of sale to the credit of the buyer on account of the money due by him, and bring an action against him to recover the balance. Rosenbaums v. Weeden, 18 Gratt. 785, 98 Am. Dec. 737.

Unreasonable Delay.—Where there is an unreasonable delay on the part of the buyer in accepting goods, the seller may recover damages sustained by him for loss resulting from such unreasonable delay, and also the profits he would have realized if he had been permitted to perform it fully. This is not a double recovery. Alleghany Iron Co. v. Teaford, 96 Va. 372, 31 S. E. Rep. 525.

a. Accrual of Cause of Action.

Anticipatory Breach.—Where the buyer refuses to accept goods that he has ordered, the seller may at once sue for damages for breach of the contract, without waiting for the period for the delivery of the goods to elapse, and without tender of them. James v. Adams, 16 W. Va. 245; Pancake v. George Campbell Co., 44 W. Va. 82, 28 S. E. Rep. 719.

Where there is a sale of personal property, to be paid for in installments, and the buyer fails to meet any one of the installments, whereupon the seller demands possession of the property, which the buyer refuses to surrender, the seller may at once bring an action against the buyer, without waiting until the time in which, by the terms of the contract, all the purchase money was to have been paid, even though in such contract the property is sold to have been hired to the buyer for that length of time. McGinnis v. Savage, 29 W. Va. 363, 1 S. E. Rep. 746.

b. Measure of Damages.—Where the contract of sale is executory, and the title and possession remain in the seller, the measure of damages for a refusal of the buyer to accept and pay for the goods, is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the goods at the time and place of delivery. Weltner v. Riggs, 3 W. Va. 445; Hall v. Pierce, 4 W. Va. 107; Smith v. Snyder, 77 Va. 432; James v. Adams, 16 W. Va. 245; Alleghany Iron Co. v. Teaford, 96 Va. 372, 31 S. E. Rep. 525.

Under a contract to pay for a given quantity of ice per year, whether the whole quantity is accepted or not—the same to be delivered from day to day as the purchaser may require—the seller is not entitled to recover for the difference between the quantity contracted for and that actually accepted where the failure to accept more was due to the inability of the seller to furnish the ice as the parties had agreed. Richmond Ice Co. v. Crystal Ice Co., 99 Va. 285, 38 S. E. Rep. 141.

c. Resale by the Seller.—When the buyer refuses to accept goods tendered according to the contract of sale, the seller may resell them at any time and in any state of the market and hold the buyer liable for any loss sustained; therefore, the fact that the seller delayed the resale of the goods for an unreasonable time upon a falling market, will not prevent recovery from the buyer of the difference between the contract price and that obtained at the resale. Rosenbaums v. Weeden, 18 Gratt. 785, 98 Am. Dec. 787.

Notice of Intention to Resell.—Where a contract of sale is executory, and the buyer refuses to accept and pay for the goods, the seller should give him notice that he intends to sell, and hold him responsible for the loss.

This notice, it will be observed, is not a notice of resale, but a notice that the seller will assert his right of resale, and bind the buyer by the price obtained. American Hide, etc., Co. v. Chalkley, 101 Va. 458, 44 S. E. Rep. 705, citing Rosenbaums v. Weeden, 18 Gratt. 785, 98 Am. Dec. 787.

Notice of Time and Place of Resale.—But where the seller elects to sell the goods and hold the buyer liable for the loss, it is not necessary that he should give notice to the buyer of the time and place of sale, and though he gives such notice, he may postpone the sale to another day, if that seems judicious. Rosenbaums v. Weeden, 18 Gratt. 785, 98 Am. Dec. 787.

Measure of Damages on Resale.—If the seller chooses to consider the property as the buyer's and resells it, using reasonable diligence to obtain its actual value at the time the contract is broken, then the measure of his recovery is the difference between the contract price of the goods and the net price which they produce at a resale, fairly made, after deducting all expenses incurred by the seller in taking care of the goods and selling them. James v. Adams, 8 W. Va. 568; American Hide & Leather Co. v. Chalkley 101 Va. 458, 44 S. E. Rep. 705.

d. Lien.—Where there is a sale of personal property to be paid for on delivery, the seller has a lien for the price so long as the property remains in his possession, but the transfer or surrender of possession by the seller destroys the lien. James v. Bird, 8 Leigh 510, 81 Am. Dec. 668.

Waiver.—This lien, however, may be waived by the seller. Neff v. Baker (Va.), 4 S. E. Rep. 620.

Equitable Lien.—But the seller of personal property has no implied or equitable lien on the property for the purchase money. Williams v. Gillespie, 30 W. Va. 586, 5 S. E. Rep. 210; James v. Bird, 8 Leigh 510, 81 Am. Dec. 668; McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. 629.

IX. FRAUDULENT SALES.

Where one buys property on credit with the positive intention not to pay for it, this is a fraudulent purchase, whether he makes false representations as to his ability to pay or not. Miller v. White, 46 W. Va. 67, 33 S. E. Rep. 333. See Wickham v. Lewis, 13 Gratt. 427; monographic note on "Fraudulent and Voluntary Conveyances" appended to Cochran v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348.

But mere insolvency or inability to pay for property purchased will not render the sale fraudulent on the purchaser's part, if he expects and intends to pay, and has reasonable grounds for expecting to be able to pay. On the other hand, however, if, in addition to insolvency, he makes false statements of his pecuniary circumstances or business, or his ability to pay, calculated to induce the seller to believe he will be paid, the purchase is fraudulent. Miller v. White, 46 W. Va. 67, 33 S. E. Rep. 333.

The intention of the purchaser of property not to pay for it may be inferred by the jury from the circumstances, actions and conduct of the purchaser, not only in respect to the sale in question, but any other contemporaneous transactions. Miller v. White, 46 W. Va. 67, 33 S. E. Rep. 333.

X. SALES BY SAMPLE.

In General.—To authorize a jury to find that a sale is a sale by sample, the evidence must satisfactorily show that the parties contracted solely with reference to the sample exhibited. In other words, unless both parties deal with the sample with the mutual understanding that the bulk is like the sample, the sale is not a sale by the sample. Proctor v. Spratley, 78 Va. 254.

Acts of Ownership.—But even though a sale is by the sample, still if either the buyer or his agent, with full knowledge of the nonconformity of the bulk with the sample, exercises ownership over the goods as by offering them for sale, this acceptance is so far binding that the buyer cannot rescind either for nonconformity or for fraud. Proctor v. Spratley, 78 Va. 254.

Place for Comparing Bulk with Sample.—And where goods are sold by the sample, the place and time of delivery is the place and time in which the comparison between the bulk and sample should be made and the goods accepted, and is also the place and time of rejection for the nonconformity of the bulk with the sample. Proctor v. Spratley, 78 Va. 254.

Warranty.—If a sale is not a sale by the sample, there can be no warranty of quality implied, and the maxim caveat emptor applies. Proctor v. Spratley, 78 Va. 254.

XI. BONA FIDE PURCHASERS.

1. TRUSTEES IN DEEDS OF TRUST OR ASSIGNMENTS.—To secure creditors are unquestionably purchasers for value; but whether they are bona fide purchasers without notice depends on the facts of the case. Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. Rep. 818; Dougllass Merchandise Co. v. Laird, 37 W. Va. 687, 17 S. E. Rep. 188; Oberdorfer v. Meyer, 88 Va. 334, 13 S. E. Rep. 756; Wickham v. Lewis, 13 Gratt. 427, and note.

2. PURCHASER FROM FRAUDULENT BUYER.—Although a sale and delivery of goods is secured by the false and fraudulent representations of the buyer, yet the title vests in him until the seller has done some act to disaffirm the transaction; and therefore if the buyer transfers the property to an innocent purchaser for value before disaffirmance, the seller cannot recover the property. Williams v. Given, 6 Gratt. 268; Wickham v. Lewis, 13 Gratt. 427; Jones v. Christian, 86 Va. 1017, 11 S. E. Rep. 984; Oberdorfer v. Meyer, 88 Va. 334, 13 S. E. Rep. 756.

Thus, where a chattel is sold for cash on delivery, and the seller delivers it without exacting payment, he cannot recover the property from an innocent purchaser from the buyer before payment. Old Dominion Steamship Co. v. Burckhardt, 31 Gratt. 664.

XII. CONDITIONAL SALES.

1. DEFINITION.—A conditional sale is a contract by which the owner parts with the title of the thing upon some specified condition, either precedent or subsequent. Baldwin v. Van Wagner, 33 W. Va. 233, 10 S. E. Rep. 716. For example, where a seller agrees to sell certain personal property to the buyer, and delivers possession, but expressly retains title until the payment of the purchase price, it is a conditional sale. McComb v. Donald, 82 Va. 903, 5 S. E. Rep. 558; McGinnis v. Savage, 29 W. Va. 363, 1 S. E. Rep. 746. See Leavell v. Robinson, 3 Leigh 181, holding a transfer of bank stock to be a conditional sale.

2. PAYMENT IN INSTALLMENTS.—Where personal property is sold to be paid for by the party receiving it in installments at specified times, and when so paid for it is to become his property, but that the title is to remain in the original owner until all the purchase money has been paid, this constitutes a familiar example of a conditional sale. McGinnis v. Savage, 29 W. Va. 362, 1 S. E. Rep. 746.

And it is not an uncommon thing for parties to word such conditional sale as though it were a leasing or hiring of the property; the object of this is frequently to make such conditional sales valid, not only between the parties, but also, if possible, against innocent purchasers from, and creditors of, the buyer. But the courts, in determining the real character of the contract, will always look to its purpose, rather than the name given to it by the parties, and will hold that to be a conditional sale which is such in law or fact, though the parties termed it a lease. McGinnis v. Savage, 29 W. Va. 362, 1 S. E. Rep. 746; Balwin v. Van Wagner, 33 W. Va. 293, 10 S. E. Rep. 716. See Arbuckle v. Gates, 95 Va. 802, 30 S. E. Rep. 496.

In Huffard v. Akers, 52 W. Va. 21, 43 S. E. Rep. 124, the court distinguished McGinnis v. Savage, supra, and Baldwin v. Van Wagner, supra, on the ground that in those cases the agreement starts out calling it a lease, whereas in the case at bar it was called a sale.

3. SALE OR RETURN.—Where the condition of the sale is that the property may be returned if it does not prove "satisfactory" to the buyer, or if the buyer is not satisfied with it after trial, this is a sale on condition subsequent; that is, the title passes with the possession, but to be divested if the condition is not performed and the property returned. In such a sale the buyer must in fact be satisfied, and if he is dissatisfied however unreasonable or groundless his dissatisfaction may be, he may return the property. Osborne v. Francis, 38 W. Va. 312, 18 S. E. Rep. 591, 45 Am. St. Rep. 859.

For example, one who buys a harvesting machine called a "binder," upon the condition that if it does not work to his satisfaction he may return it, has an absolute right to reject the machine if he so wills, without assigning any reason. Osborne v. Francis, 38 W. Va. 312, 18 S. E. Rep. 591, 45 Am. St. Rep. 859.

If a slave be sold upon condition that the buyer may return him in a given time, and while in the buyer's possession, but not through his neglect, he be disabled by cold, so as to be of little value, the buyer may refuse to keep him, and is not responsible for the loss, unless he expressly agreed to be so liable. But the buyer is responsible, without such agreement, for ordinary neglect; that is, if he failed to take such care of the slave as any man of common prudence and capable of governing his family, takes of his own concerns. Williams v. Moore, 3 Munf. 310.

Bad Faith in Refusing to Accept.—Where it is provided in the contract of sale that the article to be made shall be satisfactory to the buyer, he may arbitrarily decline to accept it and his reasons for so doing cannot be investigated, unless he acted fraudulently and in bad faith. Barrett v. Coal & Coke Co., 51 W. Va. 416, 41 S. E. Rep. 220; Carpenter v. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co., 98 Va. 177, 35 S. E. Rep. 358; Osborne v. Francis, 38 W. Va. 312, 18 S. E. Rep. 591, 45 Am. St. Rep. 859.

But in order to make out a charge of bad faith on the part of the buyer in refusing to accept goods which he agreed to accept, if they proved satisfactory, the seller must establish bad faith clearly and distinctly. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. Carpenter, 99 Va. 292, 38 S. E. Rep. 143.

4. SALE ON TRIAL.—But sometimes the chattel is taken with the understanding that the buyer is to try it before the purchase shall take full effect; this is a sale on a condition precedent to buy if satisfied; that is, the title does not pass until the condition is fully performed, although the possession is delivered. In either the bargain of sale or return, and the sale on trial, however, the buyer may peremptorily return within the time without giving any reason, if he acts honestly. Osborne v. Francis, 38 W. Va. 312, 18 S. E. Rep. 591, 45 Am. St. Rep. 859.

5. RECORDATION OF CONDITIONAL SALES.

In Virginia.—Formerly in Virginia, conditional sales, though unrecorded, were valid as against purchasers from and creditors of the buyer; and therefore a subsequent purchaser, without notice from the buyer, acquired no title against the original seller. McComb v. Donald, 82 Va. 903, 5 S. E. Rep. 558; Old Dominion Steamship Co. v. Burckhardt, 31 Gratt. 664.

But by statute in Virginia conditional sales, reserving title to the seller, must now be recorded to be good against creditors and bona fide purchasers. Therefore, if a seller of goods, by an unrecorded bill of sale, delivers possession, but retains title until the price is paid, such sale is void as to creditors of and purchasers for value and without notice from the buyer. Va. Code 1887, § 2462; Hash v. Lore, 88 Va. 716, 14 S. E. Rep. 365; Callahan v. Young, 90 Va. 574, 19 S. E. Rep. 163; Arbuckle v. Gates, 95 Va. 802, 30 S. E. Rep. 496.

Acknowledgment.—But mandamus will not lie to compel the clerk of the court to record a conditional sale, unless it is proved or acknowledged as required by law. Callahan v. Young, 90 Va. 574, 19 S. E. Rep. 163.

In West Virginia.—And in West Virginia, in order that conditional sales may be good as against third parties, notice of a reservation of title to the goods sold must be recorded in the clerk's office of the county court of the county where the property is. W. Va. Code, ch. 74, § 3; Baldwin v. Van Wagner, 33 W. Va. 293, 10 S. E. Rep. 716; Hyer v. Smith, 48 W. Va. 560, 37 S. E. Rep. 633; Troy Wagon Co. v. Hutton, 53 W. Va. 154, 44 S. E. Rep. 135.

Accordingly it has been held that goods bought under a conditional sale and placed on the leased premises before the sale is recorded, are liable to distraint for rent. Huffard v. Akers, 52 W. Va. 21, 43 S. E. Rep. 124.

Delivery to Buyer Necessary.—But the statute does not apply unless possession of the property be delivered to the buyer. Webster Lumber Co. v. Keystone Lumber Co., 51 W. Va. 545, 42 S. E. Rep. 632.

Acknowledgment of Notice.—Moreover, as the statute contains no provision requiring acknowledgment as a prerequisite to recordation, this notice of reservation of title may be recorded though unacknowledged. Hatfield v. Haubert, 51 W. Va. 190, 41 S. E. Rep. 144; Troy Wagon Co. v. Hutton, 53 W. Va. 154, 44 S. E. Rep. 135. The rule is otherwise in Virginia. Callahan v. Young, 90 Va. 574, 19 S. E. Rep. 163.

Miscellaneous Record Book.—Where a contract selling chattels, and reserving title until payment, is left with the county clerk to be recorded, the record is complete, and the fact that it is recorded in the "miscellaneous record book" will not invalidate its recordation. Troy Wagon Co. v. Hutton, 53 W. Va. 154, 44 S. E. Rep. 135.

Contracts of Hiring.—As the West Virginia Code, ch. 74, § 3, requires that conditional sales, but not contracts of hiring, be recorded in order to prevail against the creditors of and purchasers from the buyer, it will be readily seen that the question whether the transaction is a conditional sale or a hiring is important in controversies between the creditors or purchasers of the person having possession of the property and the persons claiming to be the owners of it. But see opinion of HINTON, J., in McComb v. Donald, 82 Va. 907, 5 S. E. Rep. 560. For example, in Baldwin v. Van Wagner, 33 W. Va. 293, 10 S. E. Rep. 716, a piano was rented for a stipulated amount per month, the owner agreeing that when the value of the piano was paid in such monthly payments the title should vest in the renter. It was held that this agreement constituted a sale upon a condition precedent, and therefore void as to the creditors of the renter unless recorded.

Harrison v. Sims.

Injunction—Execution on Personality. *—The owner of slave property, which has been taken by virtue of an execution issued against the goods and chattels of another, is entitled to an Injunction to stay the sale, though he neither alleges, nor proves the peculiar value of the property.

Randolph Harrison and Samuel Jones exhibited their Bill to Chancellor C. Taylor, in which they alleged that Executions to the amount of more than $700, were levied upon three negro girls, viz: Julia, 507 Lavinia and Lucy, *together with other property, belonging to a certain Charles Irvine, of the county of Buckingham: that at the sale which took place on the 22d June, 1827, under the Executions, the Plaintiffs became the purchasers of the three girls, and of three mules, at the price of $736, which property was left on the plantation of the said Irvine, for the convenience of his family, the said girls being favorite house-servants, but at all times completely under the control of the Plaintiffs: that a short time after the sale and purchase aforesaid, Edward W. Sims, the Defendant, who had an Execution, of subsequent date to those under which the Plaintiffs purchased, caused it to be levied on the three negro girls by the Sheriff of Buckingham, and they will be sold, if not prevented by the interposition of the Chancellor, on the second Monday in the following month. The Plaintiffs further state, that in consequence of their purchase, and the payment of the money, the Executions first spoken of have been returned satisfied; and to remove any false impression on the subject, they aver that it was a fair bona fide purchase, made with their own money. They therefore prayed that Sims might be made a party, and that an Injunction might be awarded, to restrain him and the Sheriff from proceeding further on the said Sims's Execution.

The Injunction was refused by the Chancellor, but was awarded by Judge Cabell, of the Court of Appeals.

The Defendant, Edward W. Sims, answered the Bill, denying that a Court of Equity had any jurisdiction in the cause, and stating many facts, which it is unnecessary to report, as the question before the Court did not turn on the verity of those facts.

The Court of Chancery, on the 28th January, 1828, made the following order: "On motion of the Defendant by Counsel, the Court, after considering the Bill only, and with due deference, being under the impression that perhaps the cases on like subjects in 3 Rand. may have escaped the notice of the Judges, doth order, that the 508 Injunction *awarded the Plaintiffs, the 6th July, 1827, by a Judge of the Supreme Court of Appeals, to enjoin the sale of the slaves in the Bill mentioned, be discharged, the same having been, as it seems to this Court, improvidently awarded."

From that order the Plaintiffs appealed to this Court.

Stavard for the Appellants.

The Attorney General for the Appellee.

June 4. The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.†

The Chancellor was mistaken in supposing, when he dissolved the Injunction in this case, that the cases in 3 Rand. on like subjects, had escaped the notice of the Judges of the Court of Appeals. A more attentive consideration of those cases would have conducted him to a different conclusion. Though there is some little diversity of opinion, whether peculiar value of slave property ought to be stated in the Bill, praying relief in such cases, yet the result of the cases is, that when that matter is alleged in the Bill, as in the case now before us, an Injunction ought to be awarded, although the party might recover damages at Law for the abduction of his property, and possibly the property itself, in an action of Detinue. But, in the case of Randolph v. Randolph, ante, 194, by a full Court on a re-view of those cases, and to settle the Law, it has been decided, that in every case in which the owner of slave property, as in the case now before us, applies to a Court of Equity, he will be entitled to an injunction, and if he makes out his case, he will be entitled to relief, though he neither alleges, nor proves peculiar value of the property. The Decree dissolving the Injunction in this case is, therefore, reversed, and the Injunction re-instated.

Statute of Frauds—Collateral Promise—What Constitutes—Case at Bar.—If C. authorise H. to say to a merchant, "that he C. would pay for any goods sold to his son-in-law L." or to any merchant of whom L. "might purchase," or "might wish to †Absent, JUDGE GREEN.

Statute of Frauds—Collateral Promise—What Constitutes.—In Ware v. Stephenson, 10 Leigh 167, it is said: "Whatever doubts may at one time have existed respecting the undertakings within the scope of the first section of the statute of frauds, it has long since been definitely settled that when the undertaking is for a consideration to be received by, or articles to be supplied to, a third person, if the transaction be such that the third person is responsible to the person who supplies the articles, or from whom the consideration proceeds, the undertaking is collateral, and if oral is not binding. Matson, etc. v. Wharam, 2 T. R. 80; Cutler v. Hinton, 6 Rand. 508."

To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Noyes v. Humphreys, 11 Gratt. 645; Radclyff v. Poundstone, 23 W. Va. 733. In Riffe v. Gerow, 29 W. Va. 468, 2 S. E. Rep. 107, it is said: "In Prime v. Koehler, 77 N. Y. 91, it was held that 'where the purpose of the promisor to pay the debt of a third person is to secure a benefit to the promisor, by relieving his property from a lien, or securing or confirming his possession, the promise is original, and not collatpurchase goods, that he would pay for L." a certain sum; this is a collateral promise, and being verbal, is void under the Statute of Frauds.

Same-Same-Same-Evidence.—In such case, if the merchant charge the goods to L., the person to whom they are delivered, such entry in his books is, (like the admissions of a party,) strong evidence against him, that he is dealing with L., and not with C., but vice versa, if the entry be against C., the promiser, such entry is not evidence for the merchant, so as to make that an original, which would have been otherwise a collateral promise.

Same-How to Be Executed.—The Statute of Frauds, is a wise and salutary Law, and should be fairly and fully carried into execution by the Courts.

This was an appeal from a Decree of the Chancery Court held in Richmond, rendered in favour of the Appellee, against the Appellant.

William Cutler had brought Assumpsit against John Hinton, for money had and received to the Plaintiff's use, in the Superior Court of Prince George. He obtained a Verdict and Judgment against the Defendant, for $2,786 60 cents, with interest from the 21st April, 1818. At that trial the Defendant offered in evidence, as a set-off, or discount against the Plaintiff's demand, an account raised against Cutler, by John Hanserd & Co., for the sum of $795 10, of which a small part was for goods furnished Cutler himself, in March, 1816, but the chief part to Theoderick Love, in December, 1816, and January, 1817, and the testimony of Samuel Hinton, who stated that, in December, 1816, the Plaintiff, Cutler, desired him to say to any other merchants that he would pay for any goods sold to Theoderick Love, if the same did not exceed $4000: that he made this communication to Hanserd & Co., among others: that in consequence of this communication, Hanserd & Co., delivered to said Love, most of the goods in the account mentioned, and some to the Plaintiff himself: that he has examined the books of Hanserd & Co., and *that on them the goods are charged to Cutler, and not to Love: that before the day of the commencement of this suit at Law, that co-partnership was dissolved, and that all right, title and interest in the stock in trade, as well as in the debts and credits, and books and accounts, were assigned and transferred, for valuable consideration, to the Defendant, John Hinton, and to prove this, a Deed was also given in evidence; but the Court refused to allow the account to go to the Jury as a set-off, because it was a debt due to a partnership, &c. The Verdict and Judgment above mentioned, were the consequence.

John Hinton then exhibited his Bill to the Chancellor, praying that the above-mentioned sum of $795 10, may be allowed to him as a discount, and that Cutler may be enjoined from enforcing so much of his Judgment by Execution: he states, that Cutler obtained the credit with Hanserd & Co., (the firm consisting of Hanserd Hinton) for his son-in-law, Love, some small part of the account being for himself; that the partnership is dissolved, of which public notice is given, and the partnership effects and debts assigned to himself. He states, moreover, that Cutler had taken a Deed from Love, for property in Petersburg, and that the real consideration of the Deed was, the responsibility which Cutler had encountered for Love's debts, and amongst others, this very debt.

Cutler, by his Answer, denied that he ever made himself responsible to the complainant for goods purchased from him by Love, or that he ever authorised Love to obtain them on his credit: he denies that Love ever conveyed to him any property to pay the debt, and asserts that Love is still considerably indebted to him. He then gives a narrative of Love's marriage with his daughter; of his becoming in debt to him; of his indiscretions and extravagance; of his promises to reform, and of his proposal to retire to the country, and keep a small store. He states, that he made some advances to him, gave his credit at one or two stores, to obtain such goods as were immediately necessary, 511 *for which he, the Defendant, paid; that the Defendant promised Love that if he would reform, he would make him a semi-annual allowance for several years; that at Love's request, he repeated this promise in the presence of Samuel Hinton, that there might be a witness to the promise, and perhaps that it might improve Love's credit; that the promise would have been performed, if Love had complied with the condition, but he became more intemperate than ever, and the Defendant then withheld from him any further advances, that he might preserve for his wife and children those funds which, if given to him, would be squandered. The Defendant not meaning to cast any imputation on Samuel Hinton, the witness, supposes he may have misunderstood the conversation, and says it is impossible he could have been so stupid as to authorise the witness to proclaim to the merchants of Petersburg, that he meant to pay some thousands of dollars, to just as many as Love could get credit with for that amount. As the conversation has been misunderstood, and may be incorrectly represented in evidence, the Defendant considers himself compelled, in the just defence and protection of his estate, and of his family, to insist on the benefit of the Statute for the prevention of Frauds and Perjuries. On this Answer, issue was joined.

The evidence given, is to the following effect.

Samuel Hinton, in an affidavit, says, that in December, 1816, Cutler requested him to inform Hanserd & Co. or any other eral, and so is not within the statute of frauds.' ANDREWS, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: 'The circumstances bring the case directly within the third class of cases enumerated in Leonard v. Vredenburg, 8 Johns. 28, viz., where the promise to pay the debt of another arises out of some new and original consideration of benefit or harm running between the newly-contracting parties. In this class of cases the subsisting liability of the original debtor is no objection to the recovery: and, where the purpose of the promise is to secure a benefit to the promisor by relieving his property from a lien, or securing and confirming his possession, the promise is original, and not collateral, although a third person may be personally liable for the debt, and the promise may be in form a promise to pay such debt, and although the performance of the promise may result in discharging the debt.' person, of whom Love might purchase goods, that he would pay for Love four thousand dollars: that he gave Hanserd & Co. this information: that goods were furnished Love, and charged to Cutler: that a part of Hanserd & Co.'s account was for goods got by Cutler: and the witness expressed the opinion, that the goods delivered Love were sold from the information the witness gave to Hanserd & Co., and exclusively on the responsibility of Cutler.

Samuel Hinton afterwards gave a deposition, taken by virtue of a commission.

512 *He says, that in December, 1816, Cutler called on him and requested him to tell Hanserd & Co., and any other person of whom Love might wish to purchase goods, that he would pay for said Love, the sum of $4,000: that it was not in his power to advance the money at that time. In answer to interrogatories by the Plaintiff, he says, that he gave this information to Hanserd & Co. a few moments after Cutler made the request, and before the goods were purchased: that, in his opinion, they would not have sold the goods, nor would Love have attempted to make the purchase, but on the faith of Cutler's promise: that Love was not present, when Cutler requested the witness to give the information: that the goods were charged to Cutler on their books: that $645 35, are charged to Cutler, for goods delivered to Love; and $42 13, for goods delivered Cutler: that Theoderick Love is considered by the witness, as a man of truth, honor, and integrity.

Samuel Turner deposed, that the mutual friends of Love and Cutler, suggested to the latter, in the fall and winter of 1816, when the habits of the former had undergone a change for the better, the propriety of advancing funds to Love to enable him to commence a small mercantile business: that it was finally agreed between them, that Cutler would give to Love four thousand dollars as a capital to commence with; to be paid by Cutler at different periods, and in the mean time he authorised and requested the witness, to inform any gentleman from whom Love might wish to purchase goods, of the arrangement: that the witness did make the statement to Colquhoun & Co., from whom Love bought goods: that, pending this arrangement, Love exhibited a statement of his debts, amounting to $5,000; the witness was a principal creditor, and Cutler only a creditor for two or three hundred: witness had taken a Deed of Trust on Love's house and lot: and it was agreed between the parties, that as Love was about to move, he should make a Deed for the lot to Cutler: that the witness should be authorised to sell it,

513 pay himself, and *that the balance should be appropriated to the discharge of the before mentioned debts: that witness sold the lot, and after paying himself, there remained two negotiable notes of $1,500 each, which Cutler demanded of him: he refused to deliver them, but knowing that Love was indebted to John Hinton, the witness delivered them to him, in order the better to secure the completion of the contemplated arrangement of Love, say, the payment of his debts: the witness further said, in answer to interrogatories by the Plaintiff, that his impression was, at the time of the arrangement, that Cutler honestly intended to do his son-in-law a favor, but his conduct since, proves the reverse: that Cutler withholds from Love's creditors what they are justly entitled to: that Love is a man of strict honor and probity, and that witness's opinion of Cutler has undergone a change.

Theoderick Love testified, that in the fall of 1816, his father-in-law, Cutler, agreed to give him $4,000, to commence a mercantile business, to be taken in goods, it not being convenient at that time for him to advance the money, and the goods could be got on a credit: to this end, Cutler went with the witness to Samuel Hinton, and Turner, and requested them to go with the witness to any merchant, of whom the witness might wish to purchase goods, and inform them that the witness had the privilege of buying to the above mentioned amount: that in making the purchases, the witness did not exceed the $4,000; and a part of the goods he bought of Hanserd & Co. to the amount of nearly $700: that being about to leave town, he offered his lot for sale publicly, but failed to sell: his object was, from the proceeds, to pay his debts: that he was advised to make a Deed to Dr. Cutler, to prevent a sacrifice, he being a monied man, and that no one would presume that he would sell it for less than its value; but, there was a perfect, full, and positive understanding, between Cutler, the witness, and his friends, that he was not to consider himself the owner of the property, but that it 514 *was to be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of witness's debts: that Cutler was a creditor to a small amount, for which he was to be paid, but to the balance he had no earthly right: the witness, however, on further reflection, determined not to deliver the Deed to Cutler, and actually handed it to John Hinton, and requested him not to deliver it to Cutler, or any one else, till he received the proceeds of the sale, except so much as would pay Turner's claim, which was nearly two thousand dollars. The residue of this witness's evidence relates to a subject having no bearing on the case.

The Chancellor being of opinion that the undertaking of Cutler was not collateral, but direct, and that the whole credit was given to him, perpetuated the Injunction. From his Decree, Cutler appealed.

The Attorney General, for the Appellant. Leigh, for the Appellee.

June 5. JUDGE CARR.*

Cutler sued Hinton in Case for money had and received to his use. On non-assumpsit pleaded, the Defendant offered as a set-off, an account for goods, amounting to $795 10. charged as taken up by Cutler, with the firm of Hanserd & Co., of which firm Hinton was one, and produced a Deed, showing a transfer of all the debts of the firm to Hinton, and also a witness to prove, that the goods were taken up by one Love,

(the son-in-law of Cutler,) on his (Cutler's) promise to pay. The Court rejected the set-off. The Defendant excepted, and a Verdict and Judgment were had against him for $2,786 60, with interest. The Defendant took no appeal, but filed his Bill for an Injunction, stating the facts of Cutler's obtaining a credit with the Plaintiff's house for his son-in-law, and a small part *for himself; that the debts of the firm were transferred to the Plaintiff; that the Plaintiff held a sum of money claimed by Cutler, which he was ready to pay him, retaining the amount which Cutler owed him; that Cutler sued for the money, and the Law Court refused to allow the set-off, because it was a debt due to a firm, &c., and praying the benefit of the set-off.

The Answer of Cutler denies positively that he owes the account claimed of him; avers that he never undertook to pay the firm for goods taken up by his son-in-law, Love, or gave him a credit with them, and relies on the Statute of Frauds to protect him from any such charge. Several depositions were taken, and on hearing, the Court perpetuated the Injunction for the $795 10, and Cutler appealed.

On the argument, the Counsel for the Appellant rested principally on two points. 1st. That the account, if chargeable to Cutler, might have been set-off at Law, and so, that Equity had no jurisdiction: but 2dly. That it could be set-off, neither at Law nor in Equity, because the promise being collateral and verbal, was void under the Statute of Frauds. We will consider this last point first, as it strikes at the root of the claim. Upon this branch of the Statute, prescribing the mode in which "the special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person," must be made, there is no difference of construction, that I have seen, between Courts of Law and Equity; indeed, it is a class of cases, which can very rarely come into Equity. The question generally is, whether the promise is for the debt of another, or not; in other words, (which, though not used by the Statute, have become technical terms,) whether the promise be collateral, or original. The cases are very numerous on the subject, and some of them contain very nice and subtle distinctions; but, the principle, which seems to be settled, is this, (as laid down by Buller, J. in Matoon v. Wharam, 2 516 *Term Rep. 80, and by Judge Rbone, in Waggoner v. Gray's Administrators, 2 Hen. & Munf. 603.) "That if the person, for whose use the goods are furnished, be liable at all, any other promise by a third person to pay that debt, must be in writing, otherwise it is void by the Statute of Frauds." Thus, in Anderson v. Hayman, 1 Hen. Black. 120. The Plaintiff was a woollen draper in London: B. was his rider, to receive orders: the Defendant meeting with B. desired him to write to the Plaintiff, requesting him to supply the Defendant's son with whatever goods he might want, on his, the Defendant's credit; and at the same time said, "Use my son well, charge him as low as possible, and I will be bound for the payment of the money, as far as 800l. or 1,000l." B. wrote to the Plaintiff, giving him the information. Soon after, the son received goods from the Plaintiff, to the amount of 800l. which were delivered to him, in consequence of the father's order. The son was debited in the Plaintiff's books: he afterwards became a bankrupt, and this action was brought against the father. The Court were clearly of opinion, that this promise, not being in writing was void by the Statute of Frauds, as it appeared that credit was given to the son, as well as to the father. In Buckmyr v. Darnall, 2 Lord Raymond, 1,085, the Plaintiff declared that the Defendant, in consideration that the Plaintiff, at his request, would let to hire, and deliver to one J. E. a gelding to ride to Reading, that the said J. E. would deliver the gelding to the Plaintiff. Held, that this was a collateral promise, because Detinue would lie against J. E. on the bailment. These cases, out of a vast multitude, serve to exemplify the general principle, that where the promisee as a double remedy, both against the promiser, and him in whose behalf the promise is made, such promise is collateral and must be in writing.

Let us now see what was Cutler's promise. Samuel Hinton has given evidence three times. In his evidence before the Law Court, he says that Cutler de- 517 sired him to "say to any other merchants that he would pay for any goods sold to Love, if the same did not exceed $4,000. In his affidavit, he says, "In December, 1816, Doctor Cutler requested me to inform John Hanserd & Co., or any other person or persons, of whom Love, his son-in-law, might purchase goods, that he would pay for Love, $4,000." In his deposition, he says, that in December, 1816, Cutler called on him, and requested him to tell Hanserd & Co., or any other person of whom Love might wish to purchase goods, that he would pay for said Love $4,000. Now, take either of these forms, and it seems to me, that this is a collateral undertaking: he promises to pay for Love, to any person that Love might purchase, or wish to purchase goods of. Love, then, was to purchase the goods, which of course would render him liable for them, and Cutler was to pay the money for Love, not for himself. Unless I have confounded things strangely, this is clearly collateral. The next witness is Turner. He says that Cutler agreed to give Love $4,000, as a capital to commence with; which sum was to be paid by Cutler, at different periods; and in the mean time, he authorised and requested the deponent to inform any gentleman, of whom Love might wish to purchase goods, "of the arrangement." Of what arrangement? Why, that he had agreed to give Love $4,000. This might induce the merchants to trust Love, but surely would be no promise, either original or collateral, made by Cutler to the merchants, to pay them money. Love is the only other witness. I question very much whether he is admissible. He seems to stand nearly in the situation of Slaughter, in the case of Waggoner v. Gray's Adm'rs, (before cited,) who was pronounced by this Court to be inadmissible. I have not thought it worth while, however, to consider this point. Admitting his testimony, and that he puts the promise of Cutler in such a form as to make it an original one, yet the positive Answer of Cutler, directly responsive to the Bill, overweighs it, even if it were entitled 518 to full credit. *I consider, then, that the promise, as proved here, is collateral, and not being in writing, could raise no claim against Cutler. It may not be amiss to remark, that I have not overlooked the fact that the goods were charged by Hanserd & Co. to Cutler, and not Love, and that this is noticed in the cases as a fact tending to show to whom the credit was originally given: it seems to me, that such entries made in the books of merchants, are better evidence against than for them. Where they charge the goods to the person to whom they are furnished, it is strong to show that they considered themselves dealing with him, and (like the admissions of a party,) may be safely taken against them: but it would be of dangerous tendency to say, that by an entry made by themselves, in their own books, they could change the complexion of their case, and made that an original, which would otherwise have been a collateral promise. This would be departing wholly from the general policy of the Law, and the particular policy of the Statute of Frauds, which is, in my opinion, a wise and salutary Law, and should be fairly and fully carried into execution by the Courts.

With respect to the question of set-off, it need hardly be considered: for, as to that part of the account claimed as furnished to Love, on the promise of Cutler, it was (if I am right,) no debt at all; and as to the part charged as furnished to Cutler himself, we think it no ground for coming into Equity.

I think that the Decree should be reversed, the Injunction dissolved, and the Bill dismissed.

JUDGE CABELL, and the PRESIDENT, concurred.

519 *Webster v. Couch.

October, 1838.

Injunction—Reinstating—Appeal.—When a Chancellor refuses to re-instate an Injunction, on new proofs of the allegations on a Bill, a Judge of the Court of Appeals has a right, on an appeal to him, to reinstate it.

Injunction—Adequate Remedy at Law.—In Shepherd v. Groff, 34 W. Va. 126, 11 S. E. †Set-Off—Unliquidated Damages.—To the point that

Edmund Webster exhibited his Bill to Chancellor C. Taylor, setting forth, that in the year 1816, he, the Plaintiff, and a certain Daniel Couch, entered into an agreement, whereby the Plaintiff became bound to convey to Couch sundry houses and lots in the City of Richmond, for which he was to receive in exchange from Couch, a good title in fee-simple to a tract of land lying on the waters of Gold Mine Creek in Hanover, containing about eight hundred acres of land: that in consideration of the said exchange, the Plaintiff further agreed to pay to Couch, and to Ellis & Allen, at the rate of $1,000 per annum, as rent for the said houses, from the 24th January, 1816, till the 1st May then next following. After executing Deeds in pursuance of the said agreement, Couch exhibited to the Plaintiff a lease, which he had previously made of part of the said land in Hanover, to a certain John T. Swann, by which the Plaintiff discovered to his great surprise, that the lessee, amongst other things, was authorized to cut and carry off from the said land, a large quantity of timber, for the purpose of erecting a barn. The Plaintiff expressed his surprise, that Couch had never, previous to the final execution of the agreement, intimated to him the authority thus given to Swann. In reply, Couch admitted that he had not, but said that timber thus cut might be valued, and settled between himself and the Plaintiff, at the same time with the rent which should become due from the Plaintiff as aforesaid.

520 *The Plaintiff further stated, that Couch mentioned at the same time, that Swann was bound by the lease to cultivate that portion of the land which had been rented to him in a farmer like manner, and expressly promised to make good to the Plaintiff, on a settlement of the rent, all damages, should any ensue to the land, from improper or negligent cultivation; and the Plaintiff avers, that the fertility of the soil was greatly diminished by Swann, and the land much injured, both by the improper cultivation, and the destruction of its timber.

He states, that Couch instituted a suit at Law against him for the rent, and recovered judgment for the whole amount, without allowing him any discount, or deduction for the injury done to the land, and the value of the timber cut therefrom: that he could not at Law establish the facts herein stated, there being no witnesses then, or now known to him, who could be produced to prove them: that an Execution has issued against his effects, which will be unjustly sacrificed, unless prevented by a Court of Equity.

He therefore prays, that Couch, and Ellis & Allen, (for whose benefit the Judgment unliquidated damages cannot be set-off in equity the principal case is cited in Cabell v. Roberts, 6 Rand. 584; Gilliat v. Lynch, 2 Leigh 506; Robertson v. Hokshead, 3 Leigh 678; Harrison v. Wortham, 8 Leigh 304; Rosenberger v. Keller, 33 Gratt. 486; Kinzie v. Rieley, 100 W. Va. 716, 42 S. E. Rep. 672.

See further, monographic note on "Set-Off, Recoupment and Counterclaim" appended to Anderson v. Bullock, 4 Munf. 442.

was rendered,) may be made Defendants; that Couch may more particularly be required to say, whether he did not promise and engage to allow the Plaintiff on a final settlement of the rent, the value of the timber cut, and all damage done to the land by Swann: that an account may be directed to be taken, before a Commissioner, or in some other proper way, of the value of the said timber, and damage to the land; and for an Injunction to the Judgment.

The Injunction was awarded by the Chancellor, on the 18th August, 1820.

Couch answered, saying expressly, that at the time he entered into the contract with the Plaintiff, he made known the fact that the land had been leased to Swann, the particular terms of which he believes were known to the Plaintiff. He says, it is untrue that he ever admitted that he had not informed the Plaintiff of the 521 terms of Swann's lease; and, as to the surprise of which the Plaintiff speaks, when the lease to Swann was exhibited, the Defendant remarks, that there was no written lease between Swann and himself; it was a verbal agreement only, of which the Plaintiff was apprised before he entered into the contract.

He says, that by the terms of the lease to Swann, it was agreed that if he would cultivate a crop of tobacco, he might have liberty to cut from the land as many poles as would build a house sufficient to cure the tobacco made, and erect it on his own land; there was no permission to erect a barn, nor was none erected. He denies that he ever did agree with Webster to be liable, or responsible in any way, for the cultivation of the land by Swann, or any one else, or to make good any damage which might be done to the land, though he denies that any damage was done, or that the cultivation was improper as far as he knows or believes. He admits, that after the money was due to him for the rent, and after repeated applications for it, he did offer the Plaintiff that if he would pay him what was due, he might have the poles which had been cut from the land valued, and the valuation allowed, but this he refused to do; he avers that the offer was one he was not bound to make, but it was made to prevent delay, and to avoid a suit. The Judgment at Law was entirely for his own benefit.

Ellis & Allan answered, denying that they had any interest in the suit.

The Court dissolved the Injunction, on the 15th January, 1821.

Afterwards, the Plaintiff filed the affidavits of John Webster and Samuel Gibbs, taken on the 8th and 9th June, 1821. The first witness, in answer to interrogatories put by the Plaintiff, stated that he was overseer for Swann, in 1816; that the land leased by Swann from Couch, was between two and three hundred acres; that it was not cultivated in a farmer-like manner; that it would have been worth 250 dolls.

522 to put it in such order, for he never saw land worse cultivated than it was; and that the timber cut off the land was worth 150 dolls., at least.

The second witness said, that he lived with Edmund Webster, at Gold Mine, in 1816: that in the course of the year Couch called on Webster, to know if he could pay him the money due him for the rent of the houses: that Webster told Couch that if he would pay him for the waste of the timber that Swann had taken from the land, and the injury done the land by bad cultivation, he would pay him: Couch said, that he would have no objection to leave the difference in dispute to any of the neighbours; he could not do so at that time, but would have it done shortly: Webster told Couch, he was anxious to have it settled as soon as possible, as he had no wish to be involved in a law suit.

On the 15th June, 1821, after exhibiting these affidavits, the Plaintiff moved the Court to re-instate the Injunction, but the application was rejected.

The Plaintiff then petitioned Judge Coalter to re-instate the Injunction, for the following reasons:

The affidavit of Webber, he alleges, establishes the fact that timber to the amount of $150, was cut off the land leased to Swann, and that by improper cultivation it has sustained an injury to the amount of $250 more: that it is admitted by the Defendant Couch, in his Answer, that by the terms of the contract with Swann, he was at liberty to cut timber on the land, and that the Plaintiff charges that the terms of that contract were concealed from him by Couch: this is charged by the Bill, and the Answer in that respect is quite evasive, the respondent stating his belief that the terms of the contract were known to the Plaintiff, but not owning the fact. In addition to which, he alleges, that there is no privity between the Plaintiff and Swann, which would entitle him to redress for the injury sustained by the land, his claim for which is on Couch alone.

523 *On the 21st June, 1821, Judge Coalter re-instated the Injunction.

The Affidavits of Webber and Gibbs, were again taken by the Plaintiff, on due notice to the Defendants. There was no variance in the evidence of the first, except that in the last affidavit he estimated the injury from bad cultivation at $200, and the value of timber taken off, at $200 or $250. The second witness, Gibbs, deposed, that Couch called on him to take notice that he was willing to pay Webster for the timber cut off the land, and the damages sustained by bad cultivation, and it was to be left to disinterested neighbours to estimate the damage in both cases. He also expressed his opinion, that the land was much injured by the taking off the timber, it being a scarce article.

The Court of Chancery, on the 25th February, 1822, gave the following opinion: "On motion of the Defendants by Counsel, to discharge the order awarding an Injunction in this cause, made by a Judge of the Supreme Court of Appeals, on the 21st day of June last, the Court being of opinion, that according to the plain letter of the Act, by which a Judge, or Judges of the Supreme Court of Appeals, may exercise original jurisdiction in granting an Injunction upon the original Bill, if refused by a Chancellor, yet such Judge or Judges, are not authorised in the opinion of this Court, by that Act, to grant another Injunction in the same case, after a dissolution in a Superior Court of Chancery, although such Judge, or Judges may grant an appeal: such is the written Law: wherefore, the Court doth discharge the said order, as im- providently awarded."

The Plaintiff obtained a Supersedeas to the said Decree, from a Judge of this Court. Hay, for the Plaintiff in Error.

Johnson, for the Defendants.

524 October 15. 'The PRESIDENT delivered the opinion of the Court.

It cannot now be doubted, after repeated decisions of this Court, that from the refusal of a Chancellor to re-instate an Injunction upon new proofs of the allegations of a Bill, an appeal lies to any one of the Judges of this Court, and that the Chancellor erred in this case in dissolving the Injunction, on the ground that the order made by one of the Judges of this Court, re-instating the Injunction, was coram non iudice. But unless the rules of pleading in Chancery are to be totally disregarded, he was correct in dissolving the Injunction, though ordered by a Judge of this Court.

The Bill, although it prays relief, is purely a Bill of Discovery, upon the express ground, that the Plaintiff was entirely ignorant of any testimony to prove its allegations, without the Answer of the Defendant Couch, with whom the contract, to be set-off against the Judgment at Law, is alleged to have been made. His Answer makes no discovery, but on the contrary negatives all the material allegations in the Bill: but, if it had not, upon the proofs in the Record, a Court of Equity would have afforded no relief. The ground for relief is unliquidated damages for a substantive injury, the remedy for which was by a suit at Law, there being no impediment to it. It was not a matter of account, to be adjusted and set-off, either in the Court of Law in which the Judgment was rendered, or in a Court of Equity. The order dissolving the Injunction is therefore affirmed.

October, 1828.

Written Instrument—Interpretation—Latent Ambiguity—Parol Testimony.—Where there is a latent ambiguity in a written instrument, it may be explained by parol testimony: or where the terms used in the instrument have not a definite legal signification, the custom of the trade, or the acts of the parties, may be resorted to, for the construction of them. But, where there is no ambiguity, parol evidence, to explain or contradict it, ought not to be heard.

John Bowyer sued out from the Justices of Greenbrier County, a Writ of Unlawful Detainer against Joseph Martin and Charles Carraway, for the purpose of being restored to the possession of a certain tenement in the said County, containing, by estimation, twenty-four acres of land, including the Muddy Creek Sulphur Springs, commonly called Patterson's Sulphur Spring Tract. The proceedings were carried on regularly, in conformity with the directions of the Act concerning Forcible Entries and Detainers. 1 Rev. Code, ch. 115.

At the trial, the following articles of agreement appear to have been given in evidence: "This article witnesseth, that I, Nancy Patterson, let all my land, including the Sulphur Spring, to Sterling Levesey, for the term of twenty-five years. The said Sterling is to make all the necessary buildings for the use of the Sulphur Spring: He is also to put the Spring in as complete order as the nature of the place will admit of, although at his own expense; and the said Nancy, and the said Sterling, are to be equal shares in furnishing all the necessities for the accommodation of the Springs, such as bedding, provisions of all sorts, and spirits; the sugar camp is to be for the use of the Spring during the partnership, and the said Nancy, and the said Sterling, are to be equal shares in all the profits arising from the use of the said Spring, and farm also. If the said Nancy should think fit to dispose of her part before the partnership dissolves, the said Sterling is to have the refusal; or, should said Sterling think fit to dispose of his part, the said Nancy is to have the refusal; and the said Sterling is to leave all the improvements in repair at 526 "the expiration of the time; and to the true performance of the above, we do each of us bind ourselves, our heirs, &c. in the penal sum of one thousand pounds. Given under our hands and seals, this 21st day of November, 1815.

"Sterling Levesey, (Seal.)

"Nancy Patterson, (Seal.)"

This instrument was assigned on the 19th January, 1821, to John Bowyer, the complainant.

There is also copied into the Record, a Deed, bearing date 13th December, 1817, from Nancy Patterson to the Defendants, conveying to them the said parcel of land: and a Deed from Elizabeth Patterson, widow, and the heirs of James Patterson, releasing to the Defendants all their right to the same parcel of land.

The Defendants filed an exception to the opinion of the Justices, on the trial of the Unlawful Detainer, which states that the Defendants, having proved the acts and declarations of Sterling Levesey, under whom the Plaintiff claims, with the view of showing the understanding of the said Levesey, of the true intent and meaning of the contract of 6th November, 1815, be-

†For monographic note on Interpretation, see end of case.

Written Instrument—Interpretation—Latent Ambiguity—Parol Testimony.—The principal of explaining a written instrument by parol testimony applies to those cases only where there is some latent ambiguity in the written instrument, or where its terms have not a definite legal signification. Harris v. Carson, 7 Leigh 639, citing the principal case as authority.

If parties, in making a contract, use words of definite legal signification, they must be understood as using such words in their definite legal sense. Findley v. Findley, 11 Gratt. 438, citing the principal case.

It is well settled that when there is no ambiguity in a written contract, parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary its terms. McGuire v. Wright, 18 W. Va. 513, citing the principal case.

See principal case also cited in Eakin v. Hawkins, 48 W. Va. 366, 37 S. E. Rep. 625.

See generally, monographic note on "Contracts" appended to Enders v. The Board of Public Works, 1 Gratt. 364; monographic note on "Evidence" appended to Lee v. Tapscott, 3 Wash. 276.

tween him and Nancy Patterson, under whom the Defendants claim, the said writing upon its face appearing to the Defendant's Counsel to be ambiguous, moved the Court to instruct the Jury, that such evidence was legal and admissible, but the Court refused to give the instruction, and instructed the Jury, that such evidence was inadmissible, either to contradict, or explain away, the plain intention as manifested by the said contract. The Jury rendered a verdict in favor of the Plaintiff, and the Justices gave Judgment, that he recover the possession and costs, and awarded a Writ of Possession.

The Judge of the Superior Court of Law for Greenbrier County, awarded a Supersedeas to the Judgment of the Justices; and on the trial of the Supersedeas, that Court, being of opinion that the Justices erred in refusing to permit the Defendants to give evidence of the understanding 527 *of the parties as to the original article of partnership or agreement entered into between them, and how they used and occupied the premises, before the assignment to the Plaintiff, Bowyer; and being also of opinion, that from the original articles, the parties were partners, and each had a right to enter on the premises, and neither had a right to exclude the other: and that therefore, the Plaintiff, Bowyer, could not have any better title under his assignment, and was not entitled to the entire possession of the whole premises, in exclusion of the other parties, reversed the Judgment and awarded a Writ of Restitution to the Defendants, Martin and Carraway, to restore to them the possession of the said tenement.

To the Judgment of the said Superior Court, a Supersedeas was awarded by the Court of Appeals.

No Counsel for the Defendants in Error.

October 15. The Court delivered its opinion.*

JUDGE CABELL.

It was not competent to the Superior Court, to give any Judgment on the merits of the case depending on the title of the parties, since the proceedings presented no such question to the Court. The verdict was a general one, and the only question presented by the Record for the consideration of the Superior Court, was, whether the Court of the Justices improperly refused to give the instruction that was asked for, or gave an improper instruction.

Where there is a latent ambiguity in a written instrument, it may be explained by parol testimony: or, where the terms used in a written agreement have not 528 a definite *legal signification the custom of the trade, or the acts of the parties, may be resorted to, for the construction of them. But, the agreement in this case, (if that which is copied into the Record be the one referred to in the Bill of Exceptions,) contains no ambiguity whatever, nor is there a word which has not a definite legal signification. It was therefore, right in the Court of the Justices, to refuse the instruction which was asked for, and the instruction which was given, was likewise correct.

The Judgment of the Superior Court is reversed, and that of the Justices affirmed, with a direction to the Superior Court, to award a Writ of Re-restitution, if the Writ of Restitution awarded by that Court has been executed.

JUDGE GREEN and the PRESIDENT concurred.

I. OBJECT OF INTERPRETATION.

A. INTENTION OF PARTIES.—The object of the interpretation of a written instrument is to determine the intention of the parties as evidenced by their language incorporated therein. Bradley v. Zehmer, 82 Va. 685; Hotchkiss v. Middlekauf, 96 Va. 653, 32 S. E. Rep. 36; Temple v. Wright, 94 Va. 340, 26 S. E. Rep. 844.

Hence agreements are always to be construed according to the evident intent of the parties, appearing from the deed itself, without a rigid adherence to the letter. Hawkins v. Berkley, 1 Wash. 206; Mineral Development Co. v. James, 7 Va. Law Reg. 558; Nye v. Lovitt, 92 Va. 715, 24 S. E. Rep. 845. See also, Cobbs v. Fountaine, 3 Rand. 487.

Such intention, as derived from the deed itself should be sought after, and carried into effect, if it can be done consistently with the rules of law. Allemon v. Gray, 92 Va. 216, 23 S. E. Rep. 296.

Meaning of Words Used.—While in the interpretation of instruments the intention of the parties is endeavored to be ascertained, still it must nevertheless be borne in mind that the true inquiry is not what the parties intended to express, but what the words so used do express. Stokes v. VanWyck, 83 Va. 729, 3 S. E. Rep. 887; Burke v. Lee, 76 Va. 889; Couch v. Eastham, 29 W. Va. 784, 3 S. E. Rep. 28; Sutherland v. Sydnor, 84 Va. 880, 6 S. E. Rep. 480. But see Mineral Development Co. v. James, 7 Va. Law Reg. 558.

II. GENERAL RULES OF INTERPRETATION.

A. CONSIDERATION OF DIFFERENT PARTS OF INSTRUMENTS.

1. INSTRUMENT TO BE CONSTRUED AS A WHOLE.—The intention of an instrument may only be based upon an examination of it as a whole. This is a rule of frequent application and is founded upon the theory that the parties had the same general intention when formulating one part as another; consequently in cases of ambiguity or inconsistency, in some of its component parts, the general intention can only be determined by a consideration of such instrument as an entirety. Allemon v. Gray, 92 Va. 216, 23 S. E. Rep. 296; Temple v. Wright, 94 Va. 340, 26 S. E. Rep. 844; Bradley v. Zehmer, 83 Va. 686; Wootton v. Redd, 12 Gratt. 208; Tabb v. Archer, 3 Hen. & M. 899; Heatherly v. Farmers' Bank, 81 W. Va. 70, 5 S. E. Rep. 754. See also, Mineral Development Co. v. James (Va.), 7 Va. Law Reg. 558; Cobbs v. Fountaine, 3 Rand. 487.

General Words Limited by Particular Words.—General words preceding words of a more particular or specific description, are restricted by the latter. Richmond Ice Co. v. Crystal Ice Co., 99 Va. 239, 37 S. E. Rep. 851, 7 Va. Law Reg. 824.

For it is a canon of construction that words of particular description will control rather than general terms of description, where both cannot stand together. Glenn v. Augusta Perpetual, etc., Co., 99 Va. 700, 40 S. E. Rep. 25.

2. EVERY PART TO BE GIVEN EFFECT.—In the interpretation of written contracts, every part of the contract must be made to take effect, if possible, and every word to operate in some shape or other. Richmond Ice Co. v. Crystal Ice Co., 99 Va. 239, 37 S. E. Rep. 851, 7 Va. Law Reg. 824; Tate v. Tate, 75 Va. 522; Williams v. South Penn Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 181, 43 S. E. Rep. 217.

Omitted Words Supplied.—Therefore words omitted in an instrument, and also in a record or statute, which can be clearly ascertained by the context, will be supplied by the court, and the instrument, record or statute will be read and treated as if the words were in it. Harman v. Howe, 27 Gratt. 676; Liston v. Jenkins, 3 W. Va. 64; Seeden v. King, 2 Call 72.

Substitution of Words.—Upon the same principle one word will be substituted for another which is plainly erroneous, as where an "and" is used for an "or." Loyd v. Lynchburg Nat. Bank, 86 Va. 690, 11 S. E. Rep. 104.

Grammatical Inaccuracies.—Furthermore bad grammar or punctuation will not vitiate an instrument, nor overrule nor control its meaning. Ketchum v. Spurlock, 34 W. Va. 597, 12 S. E. Rep. 832.

3. REPUGNANT CLAUSES.—If there be a conflict between two clauses in a deed the former will control, as where a grantor after conveying a fee simple estate attempted to restrict it by a subsequent clause. Held, that such clause was inoperative. Blair v. Muse, 83 Va. 238, 2 S. E. Rep. 31.

4. SEVERAL DEEDS COMPRISING ONE TRANSACTION.

—Where two or more deeds are executed contemporaneously and taken together they constitute one transaction, they will be considered in matters of interpretation one instrument. Anderson v. Harvey, 10 Gratt. 386.

Thus, if land be conveyed to a party, who at the same time by a deed of even date conveys it to a trustee to secure the unpaid purchase money, the two deeds will be regarded as parts of the same transaction. George v. Cooper, 15 W. Va. 666.

Must Be Unity of Parties and Subject Matter.—But in construing two deeds as one transaction there must be a unity of parties and subject matter. Nye v. Lovitt, 92 Va. 711, 24 S. E. Rep. 345.

5. MEANING OF WORDS AND PHRASES.

Ordinary Meaning Generally Given.—It is the safest and best mode of construction to give to words free from ambiguity their plain and ordinary meaning. Williams v. South Penn Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 181, 43 S. E. Rep. 217.

Consequently, technical rules of construction are not to be invoked to defeat the intention of the maker of the instrument, when his or her intention clearly appears, by giving to the words used their natural and ordinary import. Lindsey v. Eckels, 99 Va. 671, 40 S. E. Rep. 23.

Technical Terms and Expressions.—But technical words used must receive their technical meaning, unless it clearly appears from other parts of the deed that the grantor did not intend that they should have that meaning. Nye v. Lovitt, 92 Va. 716, 24 S. E. Rep. 345.

Legal Terms.—Likewise if parties in making a contract, use words of definite legal significance, they must be understood as using such words in their definite legal sense. Findley v. Findley, 11 Gratt. 434; Nye v. Lovitt, 92 Va. 715, 24 S. E. Rep. 345; Rayfield v. Gaines, 17 Gratt. 1.

B. REASONABLE AND EQUITABLE CONSTRUCTION PREFERRED.—Every contract must receive a reasonable construction. Young v. Ellis, 91 Va. 301, 21 S. E. Rep. 480.

For a construction should be avoided, if it can be done consistently with the terms of the agreement, which would be unreasonable or unequal, and that construction which is most obviously just is to be favored as most in accordance with the presumed intention of the parties. Young v. Ellis, 91 Va. 297, 21 S. E. Rep. 480.

Construction in Favor of Instrument.—The parties must have intended something by their agreement, therefore a construction which will render the contract frivolous or ineffectual should be avoided. Cobbs v. Fountaine, 3 Rand. 487.

C. LANGUAGE CONSTRUED AGAINST THE USER THEREOF—In case of doubt or ambiguity in an instrument, it will be construed most strongly against the grantor so as to give it effect, rather than that it should be void for uncertainty. Bank v. Green, 45 W. Va. 168, 31 S. E. Rep. 263; Carrington v. Goddin, 13 Gratt. 587; Tate v. Tate, 75 Va. 522; Allemon v. Gray, 92 Va. 216, 23 S. E. Rep. 296.

But this rule is not applicable to any case but one of strict equivocation,—cases where the language of the deed is susceptible of two interpretations. It does not mean that the words are to be twisted out of their proper meaning, but only that, where the words may properly bear two meanings, and where, after having applied evidence, whether extrinsic or intrinsic, there still exists an ambiguity they must be taken in the meaning most disadvantageous to the person who used them, unless the adoption of that meaning would work a wrong. Williams v. South Penn Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 181, 43 S. E. Rep. 217; Tate v. Tate, 75 Va. 522.

D. SURROUNDING CIRCUMSTANCES.—When the language of a written agreement is susceptible of more than one interpretation, that is to say, is on its face ambiguous, the courts will look at the surrounding circumstances existing when the contract was made, at the situation of the parties, and the subject matter of the contract, and will even call in aid the acts done by the parties under it, as affording a clew to the intention of the parties; but the court never resorts in such a case to the verbal declaration of the parties either before, at the time, or after the execution of the contract, to aid it in giving construction to its language. Scrags v. Hill, 37 W. Va. 706, 17 S. E. Rep. 185; Young v. Ellis, 91 Va. 297, 21 S. E. Rep. 480; Titchenell v. Jackson, 26 W. Va. 469; Shrewsbury v. Tufts, 41 W. Va. 212, 23 S. E. Rep. 692; Lindsey v. Eckels, 99 Va. 671, 40 S. E. Rep. 23; Clark v. Nunn, 25 Gratt. 290; Allemon v. Gray, 92 Va. 216, 23 S. E. Rep. 298; Stace v. Bumgardner, 89 Va. 421, 16 S. E. Rep. 252; Caperton v. Caperton, 36 W. Va. 479, 15 S. E. Rep. 257; Glenn v. Augusta Perpetual, etc., Co., 99 Va. 701, 40 S. E. Rep. 25; Scoville v. Terry, 84 Va. 549, 5 S. E. Rep. 530; Talbott v. Richmond, etc., R. R. Co., 31 Gratt. 689. See also, Leake v. Benson, 29 Gratt. 153; Heatherly v. Farmers' Bank, 31 W. Va. 70, 5 S. E. Rep. 754; Hurst v. Hurst, 7 W. Va. 299; Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. E. CONSTRUCTION BY PARTIES.—Where the language of an instrument is ambiguous, and the intention of the parties is the subject of inquiry, the construction placed upon such language by the parties themselves is entitled to great weight. King v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 99 Va. 625, 39 S. E. Rep. 701; Kidwell v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 11 Gratt. 676; Bank v. McVeigh, 32 Gratt. 580; Grubb v. Burford, 98 Va. 553, 37 S. E. Rep. 4; Clark v. Nunn, 26 Gratt. 287; American Mang. Co. v. Virginia Mang. Co., 91 Va. 282, 21 S. E. Rep. 466; Knick v. Knick, 75 Va. 20.

Although when the meaning of an instrument is clear, an erroneous construction of it by the parties will not control its effect. Knopf v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 85 Va. 769, 8 S. E. Rep. 787; Holston Salt & Plaster Co. v. Campbell, 89 Va. 400, 16 S. E. Rep. 274; Knick v. Knick, 75 Va. 20; Bank v. McVeigh, 32 Gratt. 541.

Purpose Rather than Name.—Furthermore, in determining the real character of a contract, courts will always look to its purpose, rather than to the name given it by the parties. Fidelity Ins., etc., Co. v. Shenandoah Val. R. Co., 86 Va. 10, 9 S. E. Rep. 759.

Questions of Law and Fact.—In a doubtful case, the construction, placed upon a contract by the parties, will be accepted by the court, but what construction has been so placed is a question of fact, and, in actions at law, is to be determined by a jury. Camp v. Wilson, 5 Va. Law Reg. 402.

Arbitration and Award*—Award—Setting Aside—Misbehavior of Arbitrators.—Although the submission of a case to arbitration, where a suit is depending in a Court of Law, does not come within the provisions of the Statute concerning Awards, yet the Court, (in which the submission is made a rule of Court) has a general superintendence over the award made by virtue of such submission, and may annul it, for misbehaviour of Arbitration and Award.—See generally, monographic note on "Arbitration and Award" appended to Bassett v. Cunningham, 9 Gratt. 684.

†Same—Award—Setting Aside—Misbehavior of Arbitrators.—A court of equity will set aside an award for fraud, collusion, corruption or gross the arbitrators, apparent mistakes on its face, &c. It is unnecessary in such case to resort to a Court of Equity to annul it.

Same—Same—Same—What Constitutes—Case at Bar.—Two arbitrators meet to decide the case referred to them, on the day appointed, and continue the case for good cause shown by the Defendant. On the same day they determine that they will no longer act as arbitrators, and give notice of their declension to the parties. But on being pressed by the Plaintiff, they are prevailed on by him to act again, and authorise the Plaintiff to give notice to the Defendant, of the time and place for arbitrating it; the Defendant, on the day, and at the place, protests against their power to act, and refuses to submit his case, or his evidence to them. The arbitrators, however, proceed to make up an award on the Plaintiff's ex parte evidence. This is such misbehaviour as should annul the award.

Appellate Practice—Case at Bar.—A Defendant files four pleas, one general, and three special. The third plea, which is the second special plea, is bad; and the fourth plea, being the third special plea, is good. The Record states that the Plaintiff objected to the reception of the third special plea, which objection was over-ruled. There is no other designation of the plea which was objected to, but by its number. The Court of Appeals has no other guide than the Record, and as the third special plea was good, (although the second was bad,) they must say that the objection to the third special plea was properly over-ruled.

Assumpsit in the County Court of Rockingham by Margaret Graham, Administratrix of John Graham, deceased, against John Pence for goods, wares and merchandise, sold and delivered, amounting to 94l. 4 4½. At May Term, 1819, the Defendant pleaded the general issue, and had leave to file a special plea within sixty days. At the August Term following, by consent of the parties, all matters in difference between them in this suit were referred to Robert Hinds and Samuel Henry, whose award, or the award of their umpire, to be made the Judgment of the Court. At February Term, 1820, an award was returned by the arbitrators, by which they awarded $203 40 to the Plaintiff. The award was set aside by the Court, for reasons appearing to them, and by consent

530 *of parties, the suit was referred back to the same arbitrators, who are to meet on the first Friday in March next. At the May Term following, they returned an award in the following words: "In pursuance of the annexed order, we met on the first Friday in March, at the house of John Morrison, for the purpose of deciding the case referred to us by the said order, both parties being present. John Pence produced an affidavit, by which it appeared that he was not prepared to go on to a decision of the case, in consequence of the absence of a material witness, it became therefore improper to proceed in the case on that day. We afterwards concluded we would have nothing to do with the business, but on the 11th March, 1820, a notice was given to the said Pence, that on the 24th day of March, we would meet at the counting-room of Samuel Henry, for the purpose of deciding the case referred to us as aforesaid, and upon the said 24th March, agreeably to the said notice, we did meet at the misconduct in the arbitrators. Fluharty v. Beatty, 22 W. Va. 706, citing the principal case to sustain the statement.

counting-room of Samuel Henry, both parties being present; we proceeded to examine the matters submitted to us, and after considering the same, we do adjudge and order, that the Defendant do pay unto the Plaintiffs the sum of $174 75, with interest thereon from the 17th December, 1808, with the costs attached to the same. Given under our hands and seals this 24th March, 1820.

"Saml. Henry, (Seal.)

"Robert Henis, (Seal.)"

The Court, on motion of the Defendant for reasons appearing to them, and for the testimony of Samuel Henry, one of the arbitrators, set aside the award; and on the further motion of the Defendant, the Court set aside the order of reference, to which order the Plaintiffs objected, and the cause was continued. The affidavit of Henry is to the following effect: that on the 1st March, the parties met, and the case was continued; that the arbitrators decided, on the same day, that they would not arbitrate the suit at all, and would have nothing more to do with it; that in pursuance 531 *of said determination, the arbitrators drew up a paper to that effect, signed it, and communicated its contents to the parties: that thereafter, the said Henry having been pressed by the Plaintiff to alter that determination, and making another effort to decide the said cause, he authorised the Plaintiff for himself, (but whether the other arbitrator was consulted, he knew not,) to give the notice referred to in the award: that they did meet at the time and place appointed, but Pence declined going into the question, not considering himself bound to submit to their decision, as they had at their first meeting determined to have nothing to do with the case: that he left them, and they proceeded on the Plaintiff's evidence, without hearing any from the Defendant, and made up the award as returned: that at the first meeting, Pence produced his account, amounting to more than the Plaintiff's, and stated at the last meeting, that one Wells, who decided in Harrisonburg, could establish a part of his set-offs, but he did not recollect that on the last day he mentioned the name of a witness residing in Hardy, on account of whose absence, the case had been continued at the first meeting.

At the same Term, the Defendant pleaded first, non-assumpsit, and also filed three special pleas, the first of which was a plea of set-off; the second, the Act of Limitations of one year, in bar of merchants' accounts, and the third, the General Act of Limitations. The record further states, that at the August term, 1820, the Plaintiff objected to the third special plea filed at the May term, which objection was over-ruled, and then the Plaintiff replied generally to the said special pleas, and issue was joined.

At the October Term, the cause was tried by a Jury. Verdict and Judgment for the Defendant, from which Judgment the Plaintiff appealed to the Superior Court of Rockingham. At the May Term, 1821, of that Court, the Judgment was affirmed, and the Plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeals.

October 21. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

The Plaintiffs sued the Defendant on an account for goods, wares and merchandize, &c. Plea, non-assumpsit. By consent, the case was referred to arbitrators. They returned an award in favor of the Plaintiffs, for $203 40, which for reasons appearing to the Court, was set aside, and by consent, the cause was again referred to the same arbitrators, who again made an award in favor of the Plaintiffs $174 75, which, on motion of the Defendant's Attorney, was again set aside by the Court, and on his further motion, the order of reference was set aside, to which order the Plaintiffs objected and the cause was ordered to be continued, and leave given to the Defendant to file a special plea, provided it was filed during the Term; and at the same Term, the Defendant pleaded four pleas: 1st. Non-Assumpsit; 2d. A set-off; 3d. The Act of Limitations of Merchants' accounts; 4th. The Act of Limitations generally.

At the next Term, the Plaintiffs objected to the third special plea of the Defendant, which objection being over-ruled, the Plaintiffs replied generally to the special pleas, and issue was joined. At a subsequent Term, a Jury was sworn generally, and found a general verdict for the Defendant, and Judgment, for which the appeal was taken.

Many points were raised in the argument, but the case seemed to be considered as resting principally on two. 1. The correctness of the Court in setting aside the second award, and the order of reference. 2. In over-ruling the Plaintiff's objection to the third special plea.

Reasons for setting aside awards, are either for illegality or injustice, apparent on their face, or for misbehaviour in the arbitrators. With respect to the first,

533 Courts deal *liberally and favourably with awards, but they are much more strict, where the question of misbehaviour is raised. On the question of misbehaviour, I consider Courts of Law (in awards made, as here, by rule of Court,) to have the same power as Courts of Equity. On first looking into this subject, I doubted with respect to this power. In Wills v. Maccarmick, 2 Wils. Rep. 148, and 1st. Wm's. Saund. 327, note (b.) it is laid down, that at Common Law, no award, whether the submission was by bond, other writing, or by parol, could be set aside for misbehaviour of the arbitrators, in any action, either upon the bond of submission, or the award: This could only be effected by a resort to Equity. Prior to the Statute of 9th and 10th Wm. 3, ch. 15, the Courts had permitted parties who had suits depending, to submit them to arbitration, and to make such submission a rule of Court, and the award when made, was considered a part of the rule; and though such award was not entered as the Judgment of the Court, the refusal of a party to execute it, was treated as a contempt of the rule, and process issued against him, to show cause why he should not be punished for such contempt. For cause, he might show any thing on the face of the award which vitiated it, or he might go into evidence to show any misbehaviour, partiality, or corruption in the arbitrators; and success in either of these attempts, cleared his contempt. This was a striking difference between submissions by rule of Court, and otherwise. The utility of these references by rule of Court being found, the before-mentioned Statute was enacted, enabling persons, who had no existing suit in Court, to agree that their submission of their controversy to the award or umpirage of any person or persons, should be made a rule of Court, and to insert such agreement in the submission, or the condition of the bond or promise, whereby they oblige themselves to submit to the award or umpirage, which being proved in Court shall be entered of record, and a rule shall thereupon be made

534 by the Court, that the parties *shall submit to, and be concluded by the arbitration or umpirage, which shall be made concerning them by the arbitrators or umpire, pursuant to such submission; and the party disobeying such arbitration or umpirage, was subject to process of contempt. Our Statute concerning Awards, is almost a literal transcript from this. The only material difference between them is, that under our Statute, the award, when returned, "may be entered up as the Judgment or Decree of the Court:" by the British Statute, it cannot. It has been decided in England, that their Act intended to put cases, not depending in Court, on the same footing with those that were; and both there and here, the Courts have construed the Statute to extend to those cases only, which were submitted by bond or other writing, where there was no suit depending, not to cases referred by rule of Court between suitors. The case before us is one of this last class, and therefore, not governed by the Statute. If it had been so governed, there could have been no doubt about the Court's having the power to set aside the award; for, the Statute expressly enables them to do so "for corruption, or other undue means, or where there shall have been evident partiality, or misbehaviour in the arbitrators or umpires, or any of them." It was clear, that in cases referred (not under the Statute) by rule of Court, the Court would not punish a party for contempt, if he could show any error apparent on the face of the award, or by evidence, could establish misbehaviour in the arbitrators; but, my doubt was, whether the Court could act upon the award, and annul it. This doubt has been removed by further examination. As the Statute meant to place the parties (who, having no suit in Court, chose to submit their controversies to arbitration, and have such submission made a rule of Court,) on the same footing with those who, having suits in Court, referred them by entry on the Record, the fact that the Statute, in the cases governed by it, gives the Court express power to set aside awards, furnishes prima facie evidence,

535 that the Legislature *considered the Courts as having such power in cases not under the Statute. The very fact too, that the parties have given the Court a superintendence of the award, would seem to vest them with power to set it aside; and such I find the decision, and the reasoning in Rogers v. Dallimore, 6 Taunt. 111, 1 Com. L. Rep. 329. In that case, the order was made by rule of Court, in a case depending. The award was returned, and after the time, given by the Statute for making objections to the award had passed, a motion was made to set aside the award, on proof that the arbitrator had made a numerical mistake, which he was himself anxious to correct, having put down the sum awarded at 411. instead of 611. The motion was objected to, on the ground that the Court had no power to set aside the award. Gibbs, Ch. J. who delivered the opinion, says, "It has been urged for the Defendant, that the Court has no jurisdiction to set aside awards, except under the Statute; and that if the Plaintiff applies under the Statute, he is out of time. We think otherwise, and that the rule of Court which gives superintendence to the arbitrator, gives also to the Court a superintendence over the award, and that the Court have that authority in the present case."

The power being with the Court, we must enquire whether in this case it has been correctly exercised. The evidence on which the Court acted has not been brought before us in a regular way, so as to give us a distinct view of the whole ground they acted on. The Record states, that "on the motion of the Defendant, and reasons appearing to the Court, and from the testimony of the said Henry," (one of the arbitrators,) the Court set aside the award, and it was contended strongly that as we could not see those reasons appearing to the Court, which are exclusive of the evidence of Henry, we could not pass upon their act. If we considered it in this way, I do not think the Plaintiff would have any right to complain; for, as he objected to the opinion of the Court, it was 536 his business *to bring the point before us in such a shape, as to show that we have the whole evidence on which the Court below proceeded. I will, however, examine the evidence of Henry, and taking it as the whole, consider whether the Court did right in setting aside the award. The facts are these: The arbitrators met on the day appointed. Pence produced an affidavit of the absence of a material witness, which rendered it improper, in the opinion of the arbitrators, to proceed: they, therefore, gave a continuance, but to what, or whether to any day, does not appear. On the same day of their first meeting, the arbitrators decided that they would not arbitrate the case at all, and would have nothing more to do with it, and drew up and signed a paper declaring their decision, the contents of which they communicated to the parties. Afterwards Henry, (one of the arbitrators,) being pressed by the Plaintiff to make another effort to decide the case, authorised the Plaintiff (for himself, but whether the other arbitrator was consulted he does not know,) to give the notice to the Defendant, which is annexed to the award. On the day stated in the notice, the arbitrators and parties met, when Pence said, that after their decision to have nothing to do with the case, he did not consider himself bound to submit it further to them; that he relied on that decision, which he called on them to return to Court, and left them, saying that they had no power to proceed. After he left them, they took up the case, and made their award on the evidence of the Plaintiff alone. The account produced by Pence, at their first meeting, exceeded that of the Plaintiff, and he said at the second meeting, that he had a witness residing in Harrisonburg, (where the award was made,) who could establish part of his set-off, but no witness for him was examined. Such are the facts.

In Burton v. Knight, 2 Vern. 514, it was decided, that if arbitrators hold private meetings with one of the parties, and admit him to be heard, to induce an alteration of their award, this is such gross partiality, as to induce a Court of 537 *Equity to set aside the award. In

Harris v. Mitchell, 2 Vern. 485, two arbitrators were named, with power to choose an umpire, if they could not agree. They disagreed, and not being able to agree on an umpire, threw up cross and pile for choice. The umpire so appointed, made an award, which was set aside for the conduct of the arbitrators in appointing him. So, where the arbitrators promised to hear witnesses, but afterwards made their award without hearing them, the award was set aside. 2 Vern. 251. In Smith v. Coryton, the arbitrator promised not to make his award until Smith, who was not well, should come abroad. Lord Nottingham inclined for that reason to set it aside, but the matter was compromised. Ibid. In Atkinson v. Abraham, 1 Bos. & Pul. 175, motion for rule to show cause why an award should not be set aside, on this ground, that after the evidence was closed on both sides, and the Plaintiff's Attorney gone, one of the Defendant's witnesses was re-examined, and gave a testimony different from that which he had given before and by which the arbitrator confessed that his judgment was influenced: Rule denied, but Eyre, Ch. J. said, that if it had appeared there was any surprise in it, that the second examination had been brought about through the management of the Defendant's Attorney, that might be a good objection. In Walker v. Froisher, 6 Ves. 70, the arbitrator gave notice to the parties that he should hear no more evidence: afterwards three persons came in, and the arbitrator examined them. On a Bill to set aside the award for this reason, Lord Eldon said, "I am well assured that the arbitrator is a most respectable man, but he has been surprised into a conduct, which upon general principles must be fatal to the award. He had examined different witnesses, at different times, in the presence of the parties. He recommended to them not to produce any more witnesses. To that recommendation they accede; and in effect say, 'upon the view of what is disclosed to you, do what is right between us.'" After this he 538 hears *three other persons, and he admits he took minutes of what was said. It did not pass as mere conversation. It does not appear, that he afterwards held any communication with the other party; or disclosed what passed to him: but the arbitrator swears, it had no effect on his award. I believe him. He is a most respectable man. But I cannot, from respect to any man, do that which I cannot reconcile to general principles. A Judge must not take upon himself to say, whether evidence improperly admitted, had or had not an effect on his mind. The award may have done perfect justice; but upon general principles, it cannot be supported." See also, Chicot v. Lequesne, 2 Ves. sen. 316, the strong remarks of Lord Hardwicke on this subject.

These are some of the cases on the subject. They show that strict impartiality must be observed, and that even where the Court thinks the arbitrators have been free from intentional wrong, they sometimes set aside their award, because their conduct has been such as, on general principles, cannot be supported. In the case before us it was strongly contended, that the arbitrators having declined to act upon the case, and executed a writing expressing that determination, which they communicated to the parties, had thereby divested themselves of the character and authority of arbitrators, and that the parties having assented to this, the arbitrators could not afterwards act without a re-appointment. I am by no means prepared to say, that there is nothing in this point, though I shall pass it over without further notice. The aspect of the case which strikes me as strongest against the award, is the appearance of partiality which is exhibited. After declining to act, and informing both parties of it, the Plaintiff goes to one of the arbitrators, has a private conversation with him, presses him to change his decision, and by what arguments, or means, we know not, prevails on him to agree to act. How the other arbitrator was proceeded with, we do not know. Now this was not the fair, and open course. As both parties had been apprised of the refusal to act, and had received the resignation of the arbitra-539 tors, both ought to *have been heard before they determined to change their course. The Plaintiff, if he wished to urge the parties to hear the cause ought to have given the Defendant an opportunity of attending, and objecting, if he thought proper. Indeed, after a man is chosen arbitrator, he ought not to have a word of private, and ex parte conversation on the subject, with either of the parties: it casts suspicion on him, and as Lord Eldon observes, a Judge cannot take upon himself to say that such a conversation had no influence on his mind. Were not the circumstances well calculated to awaken suspicion of foul play in the Defendant's mind? He is told by the arbitrators that they will have nothing further to do with the case. After this, he finds that without any communication with him, by the persuasions of his opponent, they have changed their determination. He receives a notice to meet, drawn, as we must conclude by the Plaintiff, in the name of the arbitrators; for, we are told that Henry, authorised him to give a notice of the time and place. Can we feel surprised, that under these circumstances, he felt himself unsafe in their hands, and refused to submit his case, protesting against their power to act farther? And ought they, when they found that their power was denied, and that the case would not be submitted to them, to have gone on, and made their award? And that wholly on ex parte evidence, when they saw set-offs exhibited, exceeding the claim of the Plaintiff, and knew that the Defendant had witnesses to be examined? It seems to me, that in such a situation of things, the straight and fair course was, to have reported the facts to the Court, and let it decide whether their power continued, and whether in the existing state of feelings of one party at least, it was most likely to produce a just result, to send the case back to them; and it really seems strange, that they who, (before any objection was made to their proceeding,) had resolved to have nothing to do with the matter, should have been so changed by the representations of one party, as to persist to try the cause in spite of the oppositions of the other. I would by no means be understood 540 *to charge the arbitrators with actual partiality, but I do think that this conduct was such, as on general principles, furnishes a justification of the Court in setting aside their award. I think the Court did right too, in setting aside the order of reference. It was a matter perfectly within their power, (it seems to me,) and under the circumstances, sound discretion dictated it, for nothing satisfactory could be expected after what had happened.

With respect to the power of a party to revoke the authority of the arbitrators at any time before the award made, that question is not meant to be touched by this opinion. The last objection is, with respect to the conduct of the Court in admitting the third special plea. It is admitted that there would have been no error in receiving an informal plea, to which the Plaintiff made no objection, because the Plaintiff might either demur, or take issue. If he did the latter, a general verdict, (as there was here,) would cure the informality. But the Plaintiff here, did object. The question seems to be, to which plea? The Record says, the third special plea. There were four pleas; one general, three special. The Counsel for the Plaintiff, contends that the objection was to the plea of non-assumpsit within one year, because this is the third plea, and evidently a bad plea, while the plea of non-assumpsit within five years, is the fourth plea, and is well pleaded. But, the plea of non-assumpsit within one year, though the third plea, is, not the third special plea, but the second only. The third special plea is non-assumpsit within five years, and this, though well pleaded, is the plea which the Record says was objected to. There is no other description of the plea in the objection, than the number, and that certainly leads us to the last plea. I cannot therefore say, that the Court erred in overruling the objection, and upon the whole, think the Judgment must be affirmed.

All the other Judges concurred, and the Judgment was affirmed.*

October, 1822.

Detinue—Evidence.—In an action of Detinue for a slave, between the child, who is sole distributee of an intestate father, and a purchaser from the widow's second husband, an order of Court appointing Commissioners to assign the widow her dower, although made ex parte, and on motion, without regular proceedings in Chancery, and the report of the Commissioners, are proper evidence, to show the slave was allotted to the widow for life only; especially, where the widow and her second husband were present, and consenting to the allotment.

Evidence—Answer in Equity.—The Answer of a Defendant in Equity, is competent evidence against the same Defendant, in a suit at Law against him, although the Plaintiff at Law was not a party to the suit in Equity.

Same—Declarations of Vendor.—The declarations of a vendor of a slave, made after the sale, are good evidence against the vendee, if they accord with the acknowledgments of the vendee himself, previously made.

Dower—Case at Bar.—If a widow, who is also Administratrix of an estate, appropriates the profits to the purchase of slaves, or other personal property, and afterwards she and her second husband agree to consider the property so purchased as part of the intestate's estate, (in lieu of accounting for the estate,) and to take the property so purchased as part of her dower, or distributable share for life, such arrangement is binding on them, and on purchasers from them, so as to vest the title, after the death of the widow, in the distributee of the first husband, in like manner as if that particular property had belonged to the intestate in his life-time.

Parol Gift—Slave—Validity.—A parol gift of a slave by a father to an infant child living with him, by a declaration that the gift is made, without delivery of possession, is not good against a subsequent purchaser of that slave, although such purchaser knew at the time of his purchase, that the father had so made the gift.

Instruction—Erroneous—Question Did Not Arise in Cause—Effect.—If an erroneous instruction be given to a Jury by a Court, and it appears, by other Bills of Exceptions, that the question, on which that erroneous instruction was given, did not arise in the cause, the Judgment will be affirmed, notwithstanding the erroneous instruction.

§Gifts of Personality.—In Virginia for more than a hundred years, there have been statutes prescribing what is necessary to make a valid gift of slaves. Dickeschied v. Bank, 28 W. See principal case also cited in Thomas v. Lewis, 80 Va. 82, 15 S. E. Rep. 389.

†Instructions—Erroneous—Effect.—In Kolner v. Rankin, 11 Gratt. 429, it is said: "That an instruction presents merely an abstract proposition, is certainly a very sufficient reason why a court may named Ford. On the trial, on the general issue, the Defendant filed three several Bills of Exceptions to the opinions of the Court.

The first Bill of Exceptions sets forth, that the Plaintiff, who claimed the slave as one of those assigned as a part of the dower of his mother in his father's slaves, introduced in support of his action a paper in the following words: "Campbell October Court, 1805. Ordered, that John 542 *Reid, Dennis Kelly, Thomas Jones and John Strange, or any three of them, lay off and allot to Judith Rosser, formerly Judith Jones, a widow of Thomas Jones, deceased, her thirds of the land and personal estate belonging to the estate of Thomas Jones, deceased.

Teste, Ro: Alexander, C. C. C."

To which order is appended a report by all of the Commissioners, bearing date 16th October, 1805, that they had, agreeably to the order, laid off and allotted to the said Judith Rosser, as her thirds, five negroes, and sundry other personal estate: and that no land was contended for. The names of the negroes were, Phill, a man, Ford, a boy, Henry, a boy, and a woman, Dorcas, and her child, Sam. And to the report was also appended a certificate of the Clerk of the Court, that the above allotment was exhibited in Court December 9th, 1805, and ordered to be recorded. To the introduction of which paper the Defendant objected, because the said order of Court, and the proceedings thereupon had, were without any suit for the division of the estate of Thomas Jones, and because Pleasant Rosser, the second husband of Mrs. Jones, under whom the Defendant claims, was no party to the proceedings; but, the Court over-ruled the objection, and admitted the paper as evidence, the Plaintiff being at liberty to prove by other evidence, that the said Pleasant Rosser was a party in procuring the order of Court, and consenting to the division at the time.

The Plaintiff further introduced in evidence an Answer of the Defendant, Benjamin Hunter, to a Bill in Equity, exhibited by one John Talbot, against the said Hunter, and Pleasant Rosser, Defendants; in which Answer, the Defendant says, "That the Defendant, Pleasant Rosser, having intermarried with the widow of Thomas Jones, acquired in her right a number of slaves, and amongst others, the slave Ford: that he has been informed, and believes, that Ford was allotted, by the Commissioners appointed to divide the estate of Thomas Jones, 543 as a part *of Mrs. Rosser's dower slaves in the estate of her first husband: that some time in the year 1812, refuse to give it: but if given and it state the law correctly. I am not aware that it has ever been held a sufficient cause for reversing the judgment. And though erroneous, it would, as it seems, not be deemed sufficient to reverse. Hunter v. Jones, 6 Rand. 541." And in Sheppard v. Insurance Company, 21 W. Va. 394, the principal case is cited to sustain the proposition that, though an instruction be abstract, if it be not calculated to mislead, the case will not be reversed on that account.

To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Kincheloe v. Tracewells, 11 Gratt. 609; Newberry v. Williams, 80 Va. 302, 15 S. E. Rep. 865; foot-note to Colvin v. Minefee, 11 Gratt. 87. See further, monographic note on "Instructions" appended to Womack v. Circle, 29 Gratt. 192.

Pleasant Rosser proffered to sell Ford to the Defendant telling him that he could readily procure from Powhatan Jones the only child of his wife by her first husband, a release of any right or title which he might have at his mother's death; and the Defendant, having a short time before, had a conversation with Powhatan Jones, had reason to believe that Rosser, by releasing his title to some other slaves claimed by said Jones, would have it in his power to procure a release from Jones to Ford, and consented to become the purchaser of Ford, provided his title was secured: Rosser thereupon proposed to execute a Deed of Trust upon Daniel, to secure the title of Ford; which being satisfactory, the Defendant became the purchaser of Ford at his full value: that Pleasant Rosser has altogether failed to procure a release from Powhatan Jones, of Ford, and the Defendant, without knowing the situation of his title to Ford, yet as Powhatan Jones claims title to him at the death of his mother, and as the Defendant has been informed, and believes that he was allotted, by Commissioners appointed to divide the estate of Thomas Jones, deceased, to Mrs. Rosser for life only, he conceives himself well entitled to claim the benefit, as he does claim the benefit, of the provisions of the Deed of Trust, &c." The whole Record, of which this Answer formed a part, was exhibited in Court. The Defendant objected to its going in evidence, because the Plaintiff in this action was not a party in that suit in Chancery; but, the Court over-ruled the objection, and admitted the answer to be read to the Jury, for the purpose of proving the declarations of the Defendant in regard to his knowledge of the title to the slave in controversy, at the time of his purchase.

The Plaintiff further introduced a witness for the purpose of proving the declarations of Pleasant Rosser, under whom the Defendant claims title to the slave 544 in controversy. *To such declarations after said Rosser had sold the slave, the Defendant objected. But the Court over-ruled the objection, and allowed the Plaintiff to prove any declarations of the said Rosser, respecting the division of the estate of Thomas Jones, and which were calculated to show how, and upon what consideration, it happened that the negro slave in question was held, and regarded by him and his wife, who was the widow and Administratrix of said Thomas Jones, deceased, as part of the said Jones's estate, though purchased by the Administratrix after the said Jones's death; or any declarations which admitted that said slave was purchased for the estate, and was paid for with the money of the estate; and also any declarations which went to an acknowledgment that said Rosser was present at the time of the allotment of dower, and privy to the division which is set forth in the first part of this exception; no matter at what time these declarations were made. To these several opinions, the Defendant excepted.

The second Bill of Exceptions states, that the Defendant's Counsel, in the course of his argument, laid it down to be law.

that a parol gift of a slave, was void as to creditors, and subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration, unless such gift come to the possession, and remain with the donee, and not with the donor; whereupon the Court stopped the Counsel, and said that was not the law in case of infants, and instructed the Jury that a parol gift of a slave by a parent to an infant child living with him, was good without any delivery of possession other than the declaration that the gift was then made, even against a subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration, from such parent, if the purchaser, at the time of the purchase, knew that such slave had been so given to the infant, although the parent should retain the possession of such slave, from the time of the gift until the sale. To this opinion the Defendant excepted.

The third Bill of Exceptions states, that it having appeared in evidence that 545 the slave in question never did *belong to the Plaintiff's father, in his life-time, but was bought by the Plaintiff's mother, while a widow, who had taken a Bill of Sale for him and others, which is set out: (the Bill of Sale is executed by Jesse Jones to Judith Jones, dated 14th February, 1798, and conveys five negroes, of whom Ford is one, for the consideration of 200l.): the Plaintiff then offered proof to show that the purchase made by his mother, was paid for with the money derived from his father's estate, and paid by his, the Plaintiff's Guardian, after the division of the estate; and that at the time when the division was made, and his mother's dower of the estate of his father was allotted to her, she and her second husband, P. Rosser, were present, and rendered up the slaves which had been so purchased, as part of the estate of her deceased husband, and made no other account of the profits of the estate, from the death of her husband until the said division; and that the Plaintiff's Guardian being present, agreed to accept, and did accept, the slaves as part of the Plaintiff's father's estate, instead of any other account of profits, and so placed them before the Commissioners, with the consent of the said Rosser and wife, and to be counted as part of said estate, of which dower was to be allotted: whereupon the Plaintiff contended that, by consent of both parties concerned, the said slaves became, the slaves of his father's estate, and that the one in question being part of those assigned as dower slaves became after his mother's death, the property of the Plaintiff, this suit being instituted since her death. The Counsel for the Defendant contended, that if the slave never belonged to the Plaintiff's father, but was purchased by the mother, after her widowhood, the slave never could become the estate of the father, so as to be the subject of dower to the mother. But the Court instructed the Jury, that by consent of the parties interested, a slave thus circumstanced might be substituted, and pass as part of the dower slaves of a widow: and if the Jury should be of opinion, from the evidence before them, that such consent was made by 546 *the parties interested at the time, and acted upon accordingly, the slaves must pass to the Plaintiff, in like manner as if he had been the property of his father in his life-time. To this opinion the Defendant excepted. Verdict and Judgment were thereupon rendered for the Plaintiff, and the Defendant appealed to this Court.

Although this case is rendered somewhat obscure, from the manner in which the points arising are stated in the various Bills of Exceptions, it seems to be substantially a case of this nature:

Thomas Jones departed this life intestate, leaving a widow and an only child, the present Plaintiff, who was an infant.

The widow administered on the estate, and having received the estate, and also derived considerable profit therefrom, she, with the assent of the Guardian of the child, made a purchase of several slaves, with the monies of the estate, and amongst them, the slave in controversy. The widow afterwards intermarried with Pleasant Rosser, after which, an order of Court was made, (on whose motion is not stated in the Record,) appointing Commissioners to assign to the widow her share of the real and personal estate. Rosser and Wife, and the Guardian of the infant, attended at the division made by the Commissioners, whether the husband and wife brought forward the slaves so purchased, as part of the estate of the intestate, and made no other account of the profits of the estate, and the Guardian of the infant agreed to accept the same as part of the father's estate, instead of any other account of 547 profits; and thus, by the *assent of all parties, they were treated and divided by the Commissioners of the estate of the intestate. Five slaves were thus allotted to the widow, including Ford, the slave in controversy, and Dorcas and her son Sam; which Dorcas was probably also one of the slaves so purchased, as one of that name is in the Bill of Sale.

The division thus made, was returned to Court and recorded. After this, the Defendant purchased the slave Ford from Rosser. The manner of this transaction is detailed in an Answer of the Defendant to a Bill in Chancery, exhibited against him and others, in relation to a slave named Daniel, by one Taibot, in which he states, that Rosser, having intermarried with the widow of Thomas Jones, acquired, in her right, a number of slaves, and amongst others, the slave Ford, and that he is informed, and believes, that Ford was allotted by Commissioners appointed to divide the estate of Thomas Jones, as part of Mrs. Rosser's dower slaves: that Rosser proffered to sell Ford to him, telling him he could procure from the Plaintiff a release of any right he might have at his mother's death; and that having had a communication with the Plaintiff a short time before, from which he was led to believe that such release might be procured on certain terms, he became the purchaser, on Rosser's executing a Deed of Trust on the slave Daniel, to secure the title of Ford: that the Defendant therefore claims the benefit of the Deed of Trust on Daniel, until the title to Ford is perfected, Rosser having failed to procure the release, and the Plaintiff asserting his title to Ford after the death of his mother.

Thus it seems the matter rested, till after the death of Mrs. Rosser, when the Plaintiff instituted this suit for the recovery of Ford.

The first Bill of Exceptions sets out the order of Court appointing Commissioners, and their report. These documents were objected to, because there had been no suit for the division of the estate, and because Pleasant Rosser was no party to the proceedings; but, the Court over-ruled 548 *the objections, and admitted the paper as evidence, the Plaintiff being at liberty to prove by other evidence, that Rosser was a party in procuring the order of Court, and present at, and consenting to, the division. The same Bill of Exceptions sets out the Answer of the Defendant above noticed, which was offered by the Plaintiff, and objected to by the Defendant, because the Plaintiff in this suit was no party to that suit; which fact, to save the expense of copying the whole Record, was admitted. This objection was over-ruled, and the Answer admitted to be read, in order to prove the declarations of the Defendant in regard to his knowledge of the title to the slave at the time of his purchase.

It is furthermore set out in this Bill of Exceptions, that the Plaintiff introduced a witness to prove the declarations of Rosser, under whom the Defendant claims title, but the Defendant objected to any evidence of the declarations of Rosser, made after he had sold the slave in question. But the Court allowed the Plaintiff to prove any declarations of Rosser, respecting the division of the estate of Thomas Jones, and which were calculated to show how, and upon what considerations it happened that the slave in question was held, and regarded by him and his wife, as part of the estate of Jones, though purchased by the Administratrix, after the death of said Jones, or any declarations which admitted that said slave was purchased for the estate, and was paid for with the money of the estate; also, any declarations which went to an acknowledgment that said Rosser was present at the time of the allotment, set out in the documents before referred to, no matter at what time these declarations were made.

For the contents of the second Bill of Exceptions, see the statement prefixed to this opinion.

The third Bill of Exceptions sets out the testimony as to the purchase of the slave by the Widow and Administratrix, with the monies of the estate as first above stated, and the instruction of the Court, 549 that by consent of the *parties interested, a slave thus circumstanced might be substituted, and pass as part of the dower slaves of a widow; and that if the Jury should be of opinion, from the evidence, that such consent was made by the parties at the time, and acted on accordingly, the slave must pass to the Plaintiff, in like manner as if he had been the property of the Plaintiff's father.

The Jury being satisfied of the facts stated in this last Bill of Exceptions, and being no doubt also satisfied of the fact, that the Defendant had full notice of the Plaintiff's claim, and that he had taken satisfactory security for the title when he made the purchase, there can be no doubt where the justice of this case lies. The only question is, whether any thing has been decided by the Court which shall make it necessary to reverse the Judgment.

The order of Court, and the report of the Commissioners, were properly admitted as evidence, especially when connected with the other facts, showing the assent, and presence of all parties at the time of the allotment. The Answer too, was properly admitted, to show that the Defendant was informed that the slave in dispute had been allotted, and that the Plaintiff claimed him after the death of his mother.

And as to the declarations made by Rosser, after the sale to the Defendant, that such allotment had been made, and that the slave was held by him and his wife under it, as stated in the Bill of Exceptions, however that matter might have been but for the disclosures and circumstances stated in the Answer set out in the first Bill of Exceptions, yet as these declarations were in accordance with the notice the Defendant admits he received before his purchase, I cannot say they were improperly admitted to go to the Jury. They were mere repetitions of what the vendor had, in perfect fairness, made known to his vendee at the time of the sale.

So, too, as to the facts set out in the third Bill of Exceptions, if they were believed by the Jury, they well warranted the conclusion they were instructed they 550 might *draw from them, to wit, that as the parties had agreed to consider the slaves, purchased with the monies of the estate, as though they originally belonged to it, and had treated them as such, instead of calling the Administratrix to account for the estate, it was an arrangement that bound her and her husband, and was equally binding on those claiming under him, so as to vest the title in the Plaintiff, in like manner as if they had belonged to the intestate.

The only remaining question, is that arising out of the second Bill of Exceptions, as to the parol gift of a slave by a parent to an infant child, residing with him. As an abstract point of Law, this I think was badly decided, and how such a question could arise in this case, in which nothing is said about a gift of a slave, is not perceived.

Had an instruction been asked for on that point, it seems to me, it might well have been refused on that ground; and had the Court simply told the Jury, that however the Law might be on that point, as there was no case before them involving the question, it would be improper for them to consider it. I presume there would have been no doubt of the propriety of such direction. It would seem to me hard and unreasonable, therefore, that an erroneous opinion of a Court on a point, which, decided either way, would not affect the case before them, should have the effect of reversing a Judgment, clearly right, according to the merits of the case really before the Court and Jury.

At present advised, I am not inclined to reverse the Judgment on this ground. If we did so, we could only direct that on a new trial, if the case should be made out as one of a parol gift of the slave in dispute, no such direction should be given. But as no such case had been insisted on, but the reverse, as expressly stated in the third Bill of Exceptions, it would surely be idle to send it back under the preposterous idea that the Plaintiff would make out such a case, and thereby clearly defeat his own claim.

JUDGES CABELL and CARR concurred that the Judgment should be affirmed.

551 *Ming and Green v. Gwatkin.

November, 1828.

Pleading and Practice—Suit in One Name—Judgment in Another—Effect.—A suit instituted in one name, will not justify a Declaration and Judgment in another; therefore, when a Plaintiff has two baptismal names, and a mistake is made in the second or middle name, it is a misnomer it is a fatal error, not only on a plea in abatement, but on a Judgment by default.

Mary G. Gwatkin sued out a Writ of Capias ad Respondendum, in debt, against Amos Hoff and Charles Ming, from the Office of the Superior Court of Law for Prince William County. It was returned "No inhabitant," as to Hoff, and the suit abated as to him. It was executed on Ming, who gave Jesse Green as his appearance bail. The Bail-Bond was copied into the Record, by which the Plaintiff was called Mary G. Gwatkin.

The Declaration was in the name of Mary S. Gwatkin, and the Judgment, which was an office Judgment, not set aside, was rendered in behalf of the Plaintiff, without naming her. The Bill penal, which was filed with the Declaration, had also the S., and not the G., in the middle name.

One of the Defendants being taken in Execution, a Writ of Error was awarded by this Court, without requiring security except for the costs, under the Act of Assembly, passed at the Session of 1824-5, ch. 21, p. 20.

Pleading and Practice—Variance as to Name—Effect.—If there be a variance as to the middle name of the payee of a note, between the description of the note in the declaration and the note itself, and such variance would even be deemed material, and it is not taken advantage of in some way before judgment, it will not be ground for reversal of the judgment, being cured by § 8, ch. 134, of the Code. This is so, though the judgment was rendered upon defendant's demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence. Long v. Campbell, 37 W. Va. 665, 17 S. E. Rep. 197. In delivering the opinion of the court, JUDGE BRANNON said: "In Ming v. Gwatkin, 6 Rand. (Va.) 551, a variance between writ and declaration as to initial of middle name was held fatal. The case is doubtful. Just the contrary was held in Dabneys v. Knapp, 2 Gratt. 855, as to difference in names of Samuel P. and Samuel B. Christian. The Ming Case was cited, but not followed. Besides, the Ming Case was under a statute which did not cure a defect in judgment by default. Hatcher v. Lewis, 4 Rand. (Va.) 152; Wainwright v. Harper, 3 Leigh 270."

Johnson, for the Plaintiff in Error.
No Counsel for the Defendant.

November 1. JUDGE CABELL delivered the opinion of the Court.

Many objections were made to the Judgment, but it is unnecessary to notice more than one of them.

The Judgment was by default for want of appearance, and consequently the Writ and Bail-Bond are parts of the Record. Shelton v. Pollock & Co., 1 Hen. & Munf. 423; Quarles v. Buford, 3 Munf. 487.

552 *The Writ is in the name of Mary G. Gwatkin, as Plaintiff, and the Bail-Bond states the suit as being in the same name. But, the Declaration and Judgment are in the name of Mary S. Gwatkin. The baptismal name, Mary G., in the Writ and Bail-Bond, is essentially different from the baptismal name, Mary S., in the Declaration and Judgment. A suit instituted in one name, will not justify a Declaration and Judgment in another. On this ground, without noticing any other, the Court is of opinion to reverse the Judgment, and to set aside all the proceedings subsequent to the Writ and Bail-Bond.

Note by the Reporter. The rule in New-York seems to be different. See the case of Franklin & al. v. Talmadge, 5 Johns. Rep. 84. In that case, the question arose on a motion to exclude a Deed from going in evidence, on the ground of its being variant from the Declaration.

Lamb v. Smith.

Parol Sale of Land—Mistake—Equitable Relief—Rescission of Contract.—Where a vendor sells a lot of land by parol; puts the purchaser in possession, and receives the purchase money, but conveys a different lot: On a Bill filed by the purchaser, requiring the vendor either to correct the mistake by conveying the lot really purchased, or to refund the money, the Court of Equity, on being satisfied that the vendor had no title to the property sold, will rescind the contract, and decree the money to be refunded.

John M. Smith, exhibited his Bill to the Chancellor of the Richmond District, setting forth, that in the year 1814, he purchased of a certain William Lamb, a lot of land in the City of Richmond, forty-three feet one way, and one hundred and thirty feet the other, for which he agreed to give seven hundred dollars: that on the lot thus purchased, there stood a small house, of which, with the lot itself, the Plaintiff †Contract—Rescission—Mistake.—It is well-settled law that, although there be no fraud, or default on either side, yet the mutual error of the parties, if that error be in a matter which is the cause of the contract, that is, is the substance of the thing contracted for, is a good ground for rescinding even an executed contract. Glassell v. Thomas, 3 Leigh 125, citing the principal case to sustain the point. And in Leas v. Eldson, 9 Gratt. 278. JUDGE MONCURE, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is now well settled that a mutual mistake of the parties in a matter which is part of the essence of the contract and substance of the thing contracted for, will be corrected by a court of equity, and may be good ground for rescinding the contract or executing it on equitable terms of compensation, according to circumstances, even though the contract be in writing, and required to be so by the statute of frauds. 1 Story's Eq. Jur. §§ 134, 144, 152, 162; 1 Munf. 330; 6 Munf. 283; 3 Rand. 504; 6 Rand. 562; 3 Leigh 118."

was immediately put in possession, 553 and that he "has paid the whole amount of the purchase money; that being satisfied with the soundness of Lamb's title, and that he could obtain a title whenever he should demand it, he never did demand it at all, but that some time in the year 1816, the said Lamb and his wife, conveyed to the Plaintiff a totally different piece of land, having no building on it, and worth scarcely one-tenth part of the land actually sold: that the Deed was lodged in the Office, and duly admitted to record, but was never presented to the Plaintiff, nor accepted by him, nor ever sanctioned by him in any other manner whatever: that there was no written contract between them; but the Complainant exhibits a diagram of the lot purchased, and of that conveyed, by which it appears that they are both on the same square, but the lot conveyed is at right angles with the lot sold, and the former includes only forty-three feet square (at the remote end,) of the latter, running on to a different street for quantity. Each lot, is however, forty-three feet one way, by one hundred and thirty the other. He avers that he never contemplated a purchase of any but the lot on which the house stood, of which he received possession from the Defendant himself: that he would not have given the same price for the other lot, nor wished to purchase it, as the Defendant well knew. He avers that he did not know of the Deed, until informed of it by the Clerk; he then took the Deed out of the Office, but relying on its correctness in every respect, did not immediately examine it. When he did examine it, he found, to his great surprise, that it was not only imperfect, but did not purport to convey to him the property he had purchased, but different property, which he would not have as a gratuity. He immediately communicated these facts to the Defendant, and demanded of him either a Deed for the lot actually sold, or the return of the purchase money, both of which were refused. As the Deed was thus fraudulently forced upon him, under a total ignorance and mistake on his part, and he refused to acquiesce in the fraud as soon as it was detected, he prays for relief.

554 *The Defendant in his Answer admitted, that he had agreed to sell the Plaintiff a lot in the City of Richmond, of the dimensions mentioned in the Bill, and that he had received the purchase money. He avers that he has made a Deed conveying, as he supposed, and still supposes, the very property he sold the Plaintiff, "but that the Respondent is an illiterate man, and knows only from the information of others the contents of Deeds executed to him, or by him." He says that his intention was to sell to the Complainant the lot which he himself had brought of James Boulton, and which Boulton had bought of Col. Richard Adams. He avers that he believes that he has conveyed to the Plaintiff the identical property conveyed by Boulton to him, and that he supposed it to be the very lot which the Plaintiff claims, that he bought. If it be not, he alleges that he himself has been imposed on by Boulton, and that Boulton's heirs or devisees ought to be made parties to this suit, and compelled to execute the conveyance.

A survey of both lots was ordered by the Court of Chancery. According to the plat returned, it appears that the diagram, exhibited by the Plaintiff with his Bill, was substantially correct. Each lot was forty-three feet nine inches in front, running back one hundred and thirty-two feet. They fronted on different streets, and were at right angles to each other, the lot conveyed only including forty-three feet nine inches of the lot sold.

Sundry depositions were taken in the cause; and the Court of Chancery, being satisfied that the proofs fully supported the allegations of the Plaintiff's Bill, decreed, that the Deed from the Defendant to the Plaintiff, be delivered to him to be cancelled, and that the Defendant pay the Plaintiff the sum of seven hundred dollars, with interest thereon from the 8th November, 1819, till paid, and costs. From this Decree, the Defendant, Lamb, appealed to this Court.

555 *Daniel, for the Appellant.

The Attorney General, for the Appellee.

November 7. JUDGE GREEN.

This is not a Bill for the specific execution of a parol contract only, but to remedy a mistake in the execution of such a contract, offering the Defendant the alternative to correct the mistake, by conveying the property really purchased, if he has a title to it, or to re-pay the money, if he has not. Here was a mutual mistake as to the very subject of the contract, and it is void, and should be rescinded, and the parties put in statu quo, by the repayment of the money, the vendor having no title to the property really sold. The Decree should be affirmed.

This was a Supersedeas to a Judgment of the Superior Court of Norfolk County. James Old, an infant by Edward J. Wilson, his Guardian and next friend, brought an action of Trespass quare clausum fregit, in the said Court against Wm. Truss. The Plaintiff, in his Declaration, complains that the Defendant with force and arms, entered on the land of the Plaintiff, and cut down, took and carried away certain pine trees, and underwood growing thereon, of the value of $1,000. The Defendant pleaded "not guilty," with liberty, by consent of parties, to prove any thing under this plea that he might do under accord and satisfaction, and the Plaintiff replied generally. The Jury found a verdict for the Plaintiff for $160 damages, and Judgment was accordingly given for this sum and costs. To maintain the issue on his part, the Plaintiff proved that in the year — the Defendant entered on the Plaintiff's lands, situated in Norfolk County, and cut down and carried away seven or eight pine trees, of the value of $——. The Defendant proved that at and before the time of the said entry, cutting and carrying away, Kedar Old was the Plaintiff's Guardian, legally appointed *and qualified by the County Court of Norfolk: that as Guardian, the Defendant made a contract with him, by which the said Guardian gave him liberty to enter upon the land and cut and carry away the trees mentioned above, upon paying their value, and that afterwards the Defendant paid the said Guardian the sum of one hundred and five dollars, the sum estimated by the said Guardian and the Defendant to be the value of the said trees: that at the time the said contract was made, the Plaintiff had little or no income, although he had some personal property, and that his Guardian, who was his Grand father, stated that he wanted some money to pay for his Ward's schooling and clothes: that Kedar Old has since died, and the next friend has qualified as Guardian. On motion of the Plaintiff's Counsel, the Court instructed the Jury, that the said Kedar Old, as Guardian, had no authority to grant liberty to lanship. He may maintain trespass for an injury to the soil; or even ejectment for its recovery. He may grant a copyhold in reversion or remainder in his own name. He may have a writ of right of ward, and recover the land and damages, as well as the body of his ward. Zirkie v. McCue, 26 Gratt. 526, citing the principal case, and 2 P. Wms. 122, as its authority. And in Ware v. Ware, 28 Gratt. 673, it is said: "Although the guardian has no beneficial interest in the estate of his ward, still his authority is coupled with an interest, and is not barely an office. In respect to the real estate, he may make a lease for years, upon which ejectment may be maintained; he may have an action of trespass against a stranger, in his own name, for spoiling the grass; he may have a writ of right of ward, and recover the land and damages, as well as the body of the ward; he may assign dower and institute proceedings for partition." Truss v. Old, 6 Rand. 554." To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Brockenbrough v. Turner, 78 Va. 454; Burdett v. Cain, 8 W. Va. 285; McDoddrell v. Pardee, etc., Lumber Co., 40 W. Va. 567, 21 S. E. Rep. 878 (in this case, it was held that not a guardian by nature, but only a guardian appointed, who has given bond as and when required by law, is entitled to the possession, care and management of his ward's estate.)

the Defendant to cut down the said trees, and that notwithstanding the contract between the Guardian and the Defendant, the cutting was a trespass, for which this action was well brought, and that the said sum of one hundred and five dollars having been paid by the Defendant in execution of the contract so made with the Guardian, was no satisfaction of the said trespass, and no sufficient defence under the plea of accord and satisfaction. To this opinion of the Court, the Counsel for the Defendant filed his Bill of Exceptions, from which the above statement is extracted.

The Defendant, by Leigh, his Counsel, prayed this Court to grant him a Supersedeas to the said Judgment, on the following grounds:

1. That in this country growing timber may be sold by a Guardian from his Ward's land, and the proceeds of such timber may well be considered as fair profits of the estate.

2. That if not, the Guardian who has permitted another person to cut the timber, is guilty of the waste, and the Guardian alone is responsible to the Ward.

3. That the license of the Guardian to any person to cut and take away timber from his Ward's land, at all events, 558 *works a complete bar to the action of Trespass. The Supersedeas was awarded.

November 12. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion.*

Possession is indispensably necessary to support an action of Trespass, quare clausum fregit; (See the cases collected 20 Vin. Abr. 463, pl. 9, 12, 13, 14;) and whether an infant can maintain such an action for a trespass done to his lands, whilst he is in the wardship of his Guardian, depends on the question, whether, in point of Law, the possession is in the Guardian, or Ward.

Our Statute concerning Guardians, recognizes only two descriptions of Guardians who have any power over the property of their Wards; Guardians in Socage, and those appointed by the father under that Statute, who are put in all respects upon the footing of the former, our Statute in this respect being a copy of the Statute of 12 Car. 2, ch. 14. Under that Statute it has been held, that although the Statutory Guardian, and Guardian in Socage, have no beneficial interest, yet their authority is coupled with a legal interest, and is not barely an office. Shaftsbury v. Shaftsbury, Gilb. Rep. 172; Eyre v. Shaftsbury, 2 P. Wms. 102, S. C. It is an interest like that of a Trustee for the separate use of a married woman, an Executor in trust, or an Administrator of an estate of which there is no surplus, after the payment of debts, all of whom have a legal, without any beneficial interest. When we consider the purposes for which the law appoints Guardians to infants, it is obvious that to enable them to effect the objects of their appointment, they must have a legal right to 559 the exclusive *possession and controul of the infant's property, so long as the Guardianship continues, without which they could not manage the property beneficially for the infant, as by renting, or cultivating, and disposing of the produce of their lands, hiring their other property, and selling that which is perishable, and which might otherwise be wholly lost. The infant being incapable of making any contract in respect to these subjects, his Guardian could not make a valid contract in his name, and must of necessity transact all in relation to his Ward's property, in his own name.

Accordingly, the authorities are uniform that a Guardian in Socage has a legal right to the possession and disposition of his Ward's land, during the continuance of his Wardship. Littleton (B. 2, §123,) takes this for granted, by stating that when the Guardianship terminates, the Ward may enter, and oust the Guardian. So the Guardian in Socage may justify the occupation of the land against the heir himself. Kelw, 46, b. He may grant a copy holding reversion, or remainder, in his own name, as dominus pro tempore, 2 P. Wms. 122; Shopland v. Ryoler, Cro. Jac. 55 and 99: He may sue and avow in his own name, 2 P. Wms. 122: He may make a lease for years, during the Wardship, upon which an ejectment may be maintained, 14 Vin. Abr. 185, pl. 4; and see Ibid. pl. 3, and 6, and cases there cited. He may have an action of Trespass against a stranger, for spoiling the grass in the Socage lands, in his own name, and not in the name of his Ward. Br. Trespass, pl. 175; Br. Garden, pl. 5, cited in Vin. Abr. 196, pl. 3, note. He may have a Writ of Right of Ward, and recover the land and damages, as well as the body of the Ward, 14 Vin. Abr. 190, pl. 1, 2. He may have an ejectment of Ward, and if the Ward himself enters and ousts him of the land, he may recover it by a Writ of Intrusion of Ward. Br. Eject Custod. pl. 11, cited 14 Vin. Abr. letter N. pl. 1, note. And to the same effect was the Civil Law, from which the Law of Guardianship in Socage was in a 560 great degree taken. "Tutores sive pupilli eorum, sive ipsi possident, possessorum loco habentur." Dig. Lib. 2, c. 15, § 5. If the Defendant in this case had entered and cut and carried away the trees without the license of the Guardian, the Ward could not have maintained the action of Trespass. That would have belonged to the Guardian, who must have accounted to the Ward for the damages recovered. But, being done by the permission of the person legally in possession, there was no trespass whatever.

It was argued, that the trees being a part of the inheritance whilst standing, became, when severed from the soil, personal property belonging to the Ward, for which he might have maintained Trover, and that the misconception of the action is cured after verdict, by our new Statute of Jeofails. The Statute of Jeofails gives that effect to a verdict only when the verdict is given without exception, but here the objection is to the verdict itself, as given under a misdirection of the Court, and if improperly given, cannot cure any error. Besides, although it is true that when timber trees growing on lands held temporarily by another, are cut, or thrown down by tempest or otherwise, they become personal property belonging to the owner of the inheritance, for which he may maintain Trover against any one who takes them, even the tenant (Uvedale v. Uvedale, 15 Vin. Abr. 142, pl. 3,) yet, in this case, the Plaintiff could not have maintained such an action against the Defendant, because the moment the trees became personal property, the Guardian had a legal right to sell them, as being perishable, and of no value, but as a subject of sale. The wrong, if any, done to the Plaintiff, must be compensated by the Guardian. The Judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded, in which the instruction excepted to is not to be given, if again asked for.

The PRESIDENT and JUDGE CARR concurred.

*Moses v. Denigree.

November, 1828.

Deed of Emancipation — Validity—Case at Bar.—A Deed of Emancipation of a slave, executed in 1781, directing the freedom to commence when he should come of age, that is, in 1798, is absolutely void: for, at that time the Act of 1723 was in force, by which emancipation was prohibited, except for meritorious services, and by permission of the Governor and Council.

Same—Same—Case Explained.—The devise in Pleasants v. Pleasants, was supported, because the Testator did not attempt to vest a right to freedom in violation of Law, but directed that his slaves should have their freedom whenever the Laws would permit it, and created a trust to support it: and that case has carried the doctrine far enough. But, where either a Deed or Will, made before May, 1782, emancipates a slave absolutely and without condition, (although the freedom is to take effect at a future time,) it is unlawful, and therefore void.

This was an action brought in forma pauperis in the Borough Court of Norfolk, by Moses, a negro man, to recover his freedom of the Appellee, Denigree, by whom he was held and treated as a slave. Judgment was rendered for the Plaintiff in the Court below, and a Supersedeas obtained, to bring the cause before the Superior Court of Norfolk County. The Superior Court reversed the decision of the Court below, and the Defendant, Moses, appealed to this Court.

At the trial of the case in the Borough Court, the parties, by their attorneys, agreed a case in lieu of a special verdict, which sets forth the following facts: Samuel Pretlow of Surry County, being at that time the owner of the Plaintiff, then a little boy, on the 13th day of November, 1781, signed, sealed and acknowledged, in the presence of two witnesses, a writing purporting to be a Deed of Emancipation in favor of the Plaintiff, in the following words: "I, Samuel Pretlow, of Surry County in Virginia, after deliberate consideration, and from the conviction of my own mind, being fully persuaded that freedom is the natural right of all mankind, and that no Law, moral or divine, hath given me a right to, or property in, the persons of my fellow-creatures; and being desirous to fulfill the injunction of our Lord 562 and Saviour Jesus Christ, by *doing to others as I would be done by, do therefore declare, that having under my care a negro boy, named Moses, aged about six years, do therefore, for myself, my heirs, executors and administrators, hereby release unto him, the said Moses, all my right, interest and claim, or pretension of claim whatsoever, as to his person, or to any estate he may acquire, after he shall attain to the age of twenty-one years, which will be on the 31st day of the twelfth month in the year 1796, without any interruption from me, or any person claiming for, by, from, or under me. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this thirteenth day of the eleventh month in the year of our Lord 1781." The above Deed of Emancipation was recorded on the 26th day of April, 1819, in the County Court of Surry, on proof of the hand-writing of one of the subscribing witnesses, (both of the witnesses being then dead.) On the 14th day of November, 1781, Samuel Pretlow made his Will, which was recorded on 23d of April following, after the death of the said Pretlow. The Testator devised a tract of land to his son, Samuel, in fee, and also the labour of his negro, Robin, and three others, until they "become free, agreeable to the manumissions I have given under my hand and seal," and "bequeathed to his daughter, Mary, to her, and her heirs forever, the labour of four negroes, viz: Moses, Joe, Tom and Tabb, until they become free." The said writing, purporting to be a Deed of Emancipation, was found among the papers of the acting Executor about fourteen years before the institution of this suit, and was never given to the Appellant, but had been offered by the Executor to the Court many years before, to be recorded, when the Court refused to receive it. Samuel Pretlow remained in possession of the Plaintiff till his death. After that, with the assent of the Executor, the Plaintiff came into possession of Mary Pretlow, the daughter and legatee of the Testator, and so continued until the intermarriage of Mary Pretlow with one 563 Samuel Hart. The Plaintiff *was held by said Hart until his death, in about 1800, when he was sold by Hart's Executor to the Defendant, Denigree. The Plaintiff came of age on the 31st of December, 1796.

Wyndham Robertson, for the Appellant.
The Attorney General, and S. Taylor, for the Appellee.

November 13. JUDGE CARR.

On the 13th of November, 1781, Samuel Pretlow, by Deed, emancipated a negro boy of six years old, named Moses, "after he shall attain to the age of twenty-one years." On the next day he made his Will, in which there is the following clause: "I give and bequeathe unto my daughter, Mary, to her, and her heirs forever, 150l. in specie, and the labour of four negroes, viz: Moses, Joe, Tom and Tabb, until they become free." The Will was admitted to record in April, 1782, the Deed in 1819, and then on proof of the hand-writing of one of the subscribing witnesses, it being stated that they were both dead. Moses, on the death of Pretlow, went into the possession of Mary Pretlow, whose husband held him till his death, about 1800, and the husband's Executor sold him to Denigree, the Defendant. This is the substance of the case agreed, and presents this question; is Moses entitled to his freedom? In 1723, it was enacted that no person should emancipate a slave but for meritorious services, and by permission of the Governor and Council. This Act continued in force till May, 1782, when a Law passed, saying, "That it shall hereafter be lawful for any person, by his last Will and Testament, or by any other instrument in writing under his hand and seal, attested and proved in the County Court, by two witnesses, or acknowledged by the party in the Court of the County where he resides to emancipate and set free

564 his slaves, who shall *thereupon be entirely and fully discharged from the performance of any contract entered into during servitude, and enjoy as full freedom, as if they had been particularly named, and freed by this Act." Did the Deed and Will either separately or conjointly entitle Moses to his freedom? The Deed was an attempt to do what was expressly forbidden by Law, the Act of 1723 declaring, that "No negro, mulatto or Indian slaves, shall be set free upon any pretence whatsoever, except for some meritorious services, to be adjudged and allowed by the Governor and Council, and a license thereupon first had and obtained." I suppose it need hardly be said that a Deed, made in direct violation of a positive Law, is void. If this Deed had been made after the Law of 1782, it would have been of no avail, for it has never been recorded according to the directions of that Act; and this Court, in Givens v. Manns, 6 Munf. 191, and Lewis v. Fullerton, 1 Rand. 15, have declared, that unless the Law is pursued in that respect, the Deed is void. By the Deed, then, as a Deed to emancipate, Moses gained nothing. The Will, taken by itself, is merely a bequest to Mary of the labor of Moses and three others, until they become free, and cannot, without violating every rule of construction, be taken to impart any right to Moses. But it is said, that the Will evidently refers to the Deed, and must be taken in connection with it. I have no doubt the Testator had that Deed in his mind when he wrote his Will; but this, so far from showing that he meant by his Will to confer freedom on Moses, is strong proof, (as was well remarked at the Bar,) that he had no such meaning, but considered that as done by the Deed already. This seems still more clear by another part of the Will, where, in the first bequest of the labor of other slaves, he says, "until they become free, agreeable to the manumissions I have given under my hand and seal." It is clear, then, that the Testator did not intend to free Moses by Will, and in the Will merely referred for the term of service, to the Deed by which he supposed 565 he had *given freedom, and this reference to a Deed void ab initio, it will hardly be contended, could make it valid. But, suppose the Testator had made the Deed a part of the Will; nay, suppose by the Will itself he had given to Moses his freedom after twenty-one, I say such a Will would have been void, and this even under the decision of Pleasant v.

Pleasants, 2 Call, 319, a case which has surely carried this doctrine as far as it ought to go. There, the Testator did not pretend by his Will to vest a present right to freedom, in violation of the Law, but devised his slaves to his children, with a clause, that whenever the Laws should permit it, they might have their freedom, and created a trust to support that devise. And the Decree in that case states, "If the Testators had devised the slaves, upon condition that the devisees should emancipate them immediately, the condition being unlawful, would have been void, and the property vested; yet the condition, that they should become free when the Law would permit it, was not of that sort." Here, neither the Will nor the Deed looked to the passage of a Law as a condition, but gave freedom upon the sole condition of the negro's living till twenty-one; and this was against Law, and void. I think the Judgment of the Superior Court must be affirmed.

All the other Judges concurred, and the Judgment was affirmed.

Spotts v. Gillaspie.

November, 1828.

Abolition of Slavery—Act of Pennsylvania—Construction.—The Act of Pennsylvania of 1780, for the gradual abolition of slavery, clearly includes all negro and mulatto children born of slave mothers after the passage of the Act, except in the cases excepted by the 10th section, such as domestic slaves attending on Delegates to Congress, &c. &c. Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—If, therefore, a citizen of Pennsylvania, after the passage of the Act, bequeath a female slave to a citizen and resident of Virginia, and after the legatee's title has accrued, the slave have a child born in Pennsylvania, and the child be then brought to Virginia, together with its slave mother, by her master, such child may recover its freedom in the Courts of Virginia.

Same—Same—Same—Same.—It seems, that though by the Act of Pennsylvania, the condition of the mother is so far changed, that her children born there, cannot be slaves, yet if she be removed by her master, her children born in Virginia are slaves, though those born in Pennsylvania are free.

'Susanna Gillaspie, a woman of colour, instituted her action in forma pauperis, in the Superior Court of Augusta, to recover her freedom, against Jacob Spotts, who detained her in slavery. The Jury found a special verdict, in which they found two Acts enacted by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, the first passed to the 1st March, 1780, entitled, "An Act for the gradual abolition of slavery," the other passed 29th March, 1788, in amendment of the former Act. By the third section of the first Act, it is enacted "That all persons as well negroes and mulattoes as others, who shall be born within this State from and after the passing of this Act, shall not be deemed and considered as servants for life, or slaves; and that all servitude for life, or slavery of children, in consequence of the slavery of their mothers, in the case of all children born within this State from and after the passing of this Act as aforesaid, shall be, and hereby is, utterly taken away, extinguished, and forever abolished."

Sec. 4th. "Provided always, and be it further enacted, That every negro and mulatto child, born within this State after the passing of this Act as aforesaid, (who would, in case this Act had not been made, have been born a servant for years, or life, or a slave,) shall be deemed to be, and shall be, by virtue of this Act, the servant of such *person, or his or her assigns, who would, in such case, have been entitled to the service of such child, until such child shall attain unto the age of twenty-eight years, in the manner, and on the conditions, whereon servants bound by indenture for four years are or may be retained and holden; and shall be liable to like correction and punishment, and entitled to like relief, in case he or she be evilly treated by his or her master or mistress, and to like freedom dues and other privileges, as servants bound by indenture for four years are or may be entitled, unless the person, to whom the service of any such child shall belong, shall abandon his, or her claim to the same; in which case, the Overseers of the Poor of the City, Township or District, respectively, where such child shall be so abandoned, shall, by indenture, bind out every child so abandoned, as an apprentice, for a time not exceeding the age herein before limited for the service of such children."

The 5th section enacts, "That every person, who is, or shall be the owner of any negro or mulatto slave or servant for life or till the age of thirty-one years, now within this State, or his lawful attorney, shall, on or before the said first day of November next, deliver or cause to be delivered, in writing, to the Clerk of the Peace of the County, or to the Clerk of the Court of Record of the City of Philadelphia, in which he or she shall respectively inhabit, the name and surname, and occupation or profession of such owner, and the name of the County and Township, District or Ward, wherein he or she resideth; and also the name and names of any such slave and slaves, and servant and servants for life, or till the age of thirty-one years, together with their ages and sexes, severally and respectively set forth and annexed, by such person owned or statedly employed, and then being within this State, in order to ascertain and distinguish the slaves and servants for life, and till the age of thirty-one years, within this State, who shall be such on the said first day of November next, from all other persons; which 568 particulars *shall, by said Clerk of the Sessions and Clerk of the said City Court, be entered in books to be provided for that purpose by the said Clerks; and that no negro or mulatto now within this State, shall, from and after the said first day of November, be deemed a slave or servant for life, or till the age of thirty-one years, unless his or her name shall be entered as aforesaid on such Record, except such negro or mulatto slaves and servants as are herein-after excepted: the said Clerk to be entitled to a fee of two dollars for each slave or servant so entered as aforesaid, from the Treasurer of the County, to be allowed to him in his accounts."

The 10th section enacts, "That no man or woman of any nation or colour, except the negroes or mulattoes who shall be registered as aforesaid, shall, at any time hereafter be deemed, adjudged or holden, within the territories of this Commonwealth, as slaves or servants for life, but as free men and free women; except the domestic slaves attending upon Delegates in Congress from the other American States, Foreign Ministers and Consuls, and persons passing through or sojourning in this State, and not becoming resident therein, and seamen employed in ships not belonging to any inhabitant of this State, nor employed in any ship owned by any such inhabitant; provided, such domestic slaves be not alienated or sold to any inhabitant, nor (except in the case of Members of Congress, Foreign Ministers and Consuls,) retained in this State longer than six months."

It is not deemed necessary to transcribe any other parts of the Act, or of the subsequent Act of 1788.

The Jury further find, that James Gilchrist, previous to, and on the 26th April, 1782, held possession of a negro woman, named Hannah, in the County of Lancaster, and State of Pennsylvania, whom he claimed and treated as his slave; and that the said Gilchrist, who was a citizen of the said County and State, on the 26th April, 1782, made his last Will and Testament, which was duly admitted to record after his death, which happened before the 569 5th of June *following. They find the Will in hæc verba, of which the fourth and fifth clauses are as follows: "4. I give unto my well beloved wife, Sarow Gilchrist, the remaining part of all my personable estate, except my negro wench Hannah, forever, and the benefits of my real estate in during her natural life. 5th. After the deyses of my well beloved wife Sarow, I give unto my son-in-law James Roberts, and Sarow his wife, my negro wench Hannah, to them, and their heirs forever.

They find, that the said Hannah is the negro wench mentioned in the fourth and fifth clauses of the said Will: that the Testator's widow in the said Will mentioned, departed this life before the birth of the said Plaintiff, Susanna, to wit, in the Spring of the year 1786; and that the said Plaintiff, Susanna, was born in the County and State aforesaid, in the Summer of the year 1786; and that after the death of said widow, to wit, in the Summer of 1786, when the Plaintiff, Susanna, was six weeks of age, a certain James Robertson, (by mistake, in the fifth clause of the Will, called James Roberts,) who resided at, and before the date of the said Will in Augusta County, Virginia, brought the said Hannah, and her child, the said Susanna, from the said County of Lancaster, in Pennsylvania, to his residence in Augusta County, in this State, claiming them as his property under the said Will. They further find, that the said James Robertson did not remove the said slave, Hannah, from Lancaster to his residence, before the birth of the child, the Plaintiff Susanna, because he conceived his right of possession did not vest until the death of the Testator's widow, which was a short time before the said birth, not more than sufficient to receive intelligence, and make preparation for the journey.

They further find, that the Defendant purchased the said Susanna from the said James Robertson, for a valuable consideration: that the said Law of Pennsylvania remained in full force from the passage of it, till after the removal of the said Hannah and Susanna to Virginia:
570 *and conclude, that if upon these facts the Law be for the Plaintiff, they find that the Plaintiff is free, and not a slave, and find for the Plaintiff one cent damages; but if the Law be for the Defendant, then they find for the Defendant.

The Superior Court gave Judgment for the Plaintiff, and the Defendant appealed. Stanard, for the Appellant.

Johnson, for the Appellee.

November 17. The PRESIDENT delivered his opinion.

This suit is in behalf of a pauper, and her descendants, for their freedom. The Jury have found a special verdict, on which the Court below has adjudged the Law for the Plaintiff, and an appeal is taken to this Court.

The Jury find, that in 1780, the State of Pennsylvania passed a Law for the gradual abolition of slavery, which they set out at length. The third section enacts, that all persons, as well negroes and mulattoes as others, who shall be born within this State, from and after the passing of this Act, shall not be deemed, and considered as servants for life, or slaves, and that all servitude for life, or slavery of children, in consequence of the slavery of their mothers, in the case of all children born within the State from and after the passing of the Act shall be, and is hereby utterly taken away, extinguished and abolished. By the fourth section, the children of slaves born within the State after the passing of the Act, are to be held by the owners of their mothers, until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-eight years, upon the same terms and conditions, that servants bound by indenture for four years are subject to, unless the person entitled to the service of such child, shall abandon his claim, in which case, the Overseers of the Poor shall by indenture, bind out every such child as an apprentice, for a time not exceeding the age be-

571 fore limited. *The fifth section directs, that all slaves, or servants for life, or thirty-one years, shall be registered by their owners, with the Clerk of the County, &c., in which he resides, before the 1st November following, and that no negro or mulatto now within the State shall be deemed a slave unless his, or her name shall be entered as aforesaid on such Record, except as after excepted. The tenth section contains the exception, which extends to domestic slaves attending upon Delegates in Congress, Foreign Ministers and Consuls, and persons passing through, or sojourning in the State, and not becoming residents therein, and seamen, &c. employed in ships not belonging to inhabitants of the State. These are all the parts of the Law that have any bearing on the case before us. The Jury also set out an Act of Pennsylvania in 1788, explaining and amending the former, which it does not seem necessary to notice. They next find the Will of Gilcrist, a citizen of Pennsylvania, made in 1782, in which he gives to his wife for life, and after her death, to his son-in-law James Robertson, and Sarah his wife, his negro woman Hannah, whom the Jury find, he claimed and treated as a slave: they find that his widow died in the Spring of 1786: that shortly after, in the Summer of 1786, Hannah had a child, the Plaintiff, Susanna; that when Susanna was about six weeks old, the said James Robertson, who then, and at the making of the Will, lived in Augusta County, Virginia, went to Pennsylvania, and brought to Augusta, Hannah, and the Plaintiff, Susanna, claiming them as his property: that the Defendant Spotts, bought Susanna of Robertson, for a valuable consideration: and they further find, that the Pennsylvania Law of 1780, remained in full force from the passage thereof until the removal of Hannah and Susanna. These are the facts on which the question depends.

In the argument, it was contended, 1st. That the case before us was not embraced by the Law of Pennsylvania, because not within the words, and 572 meaning of the Law; *and 2dly. If it were, a Court in Virginia would not give effect to it, and thereby confiscate the property of a citizen of Virginia.

As to the first objection, it seems to me that the case is clearly embraced by the Law of Pennsylvania. The third section includes all children born of slaves after the passage thereof, to whomsoever their mothers might belong, whether citizens of Pennsylvania, or other States. The exceptions in the tenth section are pointed to children born of slaves within the State, and excludes them from the operation of the Act, because of the ownership of Delegates to Congress, &c. These exceptions do not narrow the construction of the Act, by any possible inference as to other children born of slaves within the State, than those within the exceptions. Throughout, the Law applies to them as persons, and not as property, by which to limit its operation, by the rights of the owners of the mothers.

The second question, then, as to the power of the State of Pennsylvania to confiscate the property of a citizen of Virginia, does not directly occur. The power of the State of Pennsylvania to change the condition of persons, held under its Law (and no other) in slavery, cannot be questioned, especially if they were not then the property of a citizen of another State, which is not the case before the Court.

If at the time the Act of 1780 passed, and went into operation, Hannah, the mother of Susanna, the Plaintiff, was the slave of Gilcrist, (which is not positively found by the verdict,) both his property in her, and her condition as a slave, were subject to the Law of Pennsylvania. It might, and did change the character of his property in her, and in so far, her condition as a slave. Before the passage of the Act of 1780, he held an absolute property in her, and her children then to be born. Afterwards, though his property in her was, as to her services, the same, her condition was so changed that she could not be the mother of a slave in Pennsylvania, and his property in her to that extent was changed. The Law of Pennsylvania was, as regarded his property 573 *in her and her condition, executed.

His Will could not affect this state of things. It might pass his qualified property in her and her future offspring, according to the provisions of the Act, but it could not alter the then condition, either of Hannah, or of her offspring born afterwards: They remained as before under the Act. Susanna, the Plaintiff, was born under its operation in Pennsylvania: by it though born of a slave, she was free: and in this aspect of the case, the Court is not called on to execute the Law of Pennsylvania, but the Law of Virginia, which does not now, and did not then, permit a person free in Pennsylvania, to be held in slavery here.

If Susanna had been born in Virginia, after the removal of her mother, the question would be a different one. It might be argued, that though the Law of Pennsylvania had imparted to Hannah a new condition; that is, that though a slave absolutely as to service, her children were not to follow her condition as in Virginia, yet that in Virginia, her condition in Pennsylvania would not protect her children born here. How that would be, it is not necessary for the Court to decide. The Judgment ought to be affirmed.

The other JUDGES, CABELL, COALTER, GREEN and CARR, concurred, that the Judgment be affirmed.

November, 1823.

Joint Obligors—Death of One Obligor Pending Proceedings—Sci. Facias—Presumption—Where two obligors are sued, and both die pending the proceedings, though it is not expressed which of them died first; on a Sci. Fa. against the Administrator of one of them, who does not demur to the Sci. Fa., nor plead a variance between it and the proceedings on which it issued, but pleads to issue. It must be understood that the other obligor died first, and that the action survived against the obligor, against whose representative the Sci. Facias was sued out.

Evidence—Receipts—Witness.—If a witness introduced by the Plaintiff speaks of receipts which he had taken, the evidence ought to be rejected, unless he can show that they were lost, or out of the power of the Plaintiff.

Guardian and Ward—Official Bond—Discharge of Bond by Guardian and Ward.—A bond given by a guardian, on a settlement with his Ward after she comes of age, is no discharge of the Guardian's Bond, previously given by the Guardian and his sureties; nor can it be given in evidence under the plea of conditions performed in bar of the speciality, though it may be given in evidence as proof of what is due.

On the 28th July, 1823, Thomas Atkinson survivor of Peterson Goodwyn and four *Evidence—Receipts.—In Bowles v. Elmore, 7 Gratt. 293, it is said: "When a receipt is given for a payment, the general opinion is that the payment may be proved as well by parol evidence of the facts as by the production and proof of the receipt, though the case of Hamlin v. Atkinson, 6 Rand. 574, has thrown some doubt on that question in this state. But I doubt whether the case under consideration falls in that class."

*Guardian and Ward—Official Bond Discharged—Bond by Guardian to Ward.—In Smith v. Blackwell, others, Justices of Dinwiddie County, for the benefit, and at the costs of Mary W. Lanier, sued out of the Superior Court of Law for the Town of Petersburg, a Writ of Capias ad Respondendum against William Wills and John Hamlin, on a Guardian's bond executed by the former as principal, and the latter as surety. The Writ was executed on Wills, and returned "Not found," as to the other Defendant. An Alias was, in the following September, issued against Hamlin, returnable to the November Rules, and returned executed. The Plaintiff filed his Declaration against both Defendants at the September Rules, which sets forth the bond, of which the condition is that the Guardian, Wills, shall deliver to Mary W. Lanier, the Ward, on her attaining to lawful age, all the estate due to the said orphan, and to account, &c. The breaches assigned, are the neglect and refusal to deliver over the estate, and the non-payment to the Ward of the sum of $373, with interest from the 1st March, 1819, found due from the Guardian. A common order was entered against 575 the Defendant, Wills, at the September Rules, which was confirmed at the October Rules, and a Writ of Enquiry then awarded; and at the October Term, the Court not being held, the cause was continued as to him. At the November Rules, the common order was entered against the other Defendant, Hamlin, which was confirmed, and the Writ of Enquiry awarded at the December Rules. At the next Term of the Court, which was in May, 1824, an entry was made on the Record, that "this suit abates by the death of the Defendant." [Although it must have been on the docket against two Defendants, yet it was abated only as to one, without naming which one.] At the October Term, 1824, the entry is, that "this suit, which stands for revival, is continued till the next Court." At the May Term, 1825, the Plaintiff, at the instance of the relator, sued out a Scire Facias to revive, against Vivant Quinchett, Administrator of John Hamilton, deceased; and that not being executed, an Alias Scire Facias was sued out against the same person, at the rules in August, 1825, returnable to September; and that being returned executed, a Judgment by default was entered against the Administrator, with a writ of Enquiry of damages. At the October Term, 1825, the cause was continued. At the May Term, 1826, the Defendant (who is described as Administrator of John Hamlin, deceased, who was co-obligor with William Wills, deceased,) pleaded "Conditions performed," on which issue being joined, a trial was had, and a Verdict and Judgment rendered in behalf of the Plaintiff for the debt in the Declaration mentioned, to be discharged by the payment of $267, with interest from the 1st October, 1829. There was a Bill of Exceptions taken to two opinions of the Court given during the trial. It stated, that the Plaintiff introduced Robert Lanier as a witness to prove that he, as the Administrator of his mother, had paid to William Wills in his life-time, as Guardian of the beneficiary Plaintiff, the sum of about $300, at different times in the years 1808-'9 576 and '10, it being the *amount to which she was entitled from the said decedent's estate: that he took the said Will's receipts for the sums so paid: that on the evening before the witness gave evidence, he was requested by the Plaintiff's Counsel to bring the said receipts, but not recollecting where he had put them; and thinking it probable he could not find them, he had made no examination for them; whereupon, the Defendant objected to the said evidence, and required the production of the said receipts. but the Court over-ruled the objection, and admitted the testimony.

The Defendant afterwards proved that in 1819, a settlement had taken place between the said Mary W. Lanier, then of full age, and her said Guardian, in which the matter was found indebted to her in the sum of $373, for the payment whereof, he executed his bond to her payable on demand, with interest from the date; that she took the said Bond, and had received two partial payments, which were credited on the same, but that a balance was still due on the said Bond, to recover the amount of which, this action was brought; whereupon, the Defendant moved the Court to instruct the Jury, that the settlement of the Guardianship accounts between the Ward, after she was of age, and her Guardian, and the execution of the Bond by the latter to the former, together with her accepting the said Bond, and receiving partial payments thereon, discharged the Testator of the Defendant from his liability as surety of the Guardian for the sum for which the said Bond was taken; although there was no evidence to prove, that the said Bond was accepted by the said Mary W. Lanier, as full payment or satisfaction of the claim against her said Guardian; which instruction the Court refused to give, and the Defendant excepted. The case came here by a Superseas to the Judgment.

31 Gratt. 297. It is said: "The court is of opinion that the bonds executed by James Blackwell, deceased, in his lifetime, to his ward, James D. Blackwell, and which are the subject of this contention, were given for the balance due him by the said James Blackwell as his guardian: and that said bonds were given as an acknowledgment of the amount of his indebtedness to him and to get time for the payment thereof; that the giving of said bonds and their acceptance by the ward did not merge the debt due to the ward by the obligor in his fiduciary character, and was not a discharge or extinguishment of the same until paid; and the bonds being executed for a pre-existing debt, due from the obligor as guardian, were not a novation of the debt, and did not change its fiduciary character. In Hamlin v. Atkinson, 8 Rand. 574, the question whether a bond taken by the ward for the amount appearing due from the guardian on settlement merged the original right of action. JUDGE ALLEN remarks in Yerby & Wife v. Lynch & al. 3 Gratt. 460 was in effect decided by this court. It was there decided that such subsequent bond was no discharge of the official bond unless given and received in full satisfaction. A bond to perform that for which the party was before bound by another bond is no discharge of the latter.' And in the same case JUDGE STANARD concedes 'the inefficiency of one security to merge another of equal or higher dignity.' And in the same case JUDGE BROOKS said that the bond given by the guardian to the husband of his ward did not merge the official bond, is settled in the case of Hamlin v. Atkinson. 'In that case the bond of the guardian was given to his adult ward when she was sui juris and competent to contract for herself. Yet the court held that a bond for the same thing did not extinguish the official bond, and the ward might recover from the sureties in that bond what was due to her from the guardian, treating the bond given her as proof of what was due; and in this the whole court concurred.' In a note, it is said, JUDGE GREEN, in a manuscript opinion in Hamlin's Adm'r v. Atkinson, said: 'The bond given by the guardian to his ward for the amount due to her by settlement was not a discharge of the surety in his official bond. No bond can, in any case, be a bar or satisfaction of another by the same person.' By giving and receiving the bonds in this case the debt did not lose its fiduciary character. It not appearing that there was any agreement by the ward to receive it in full discharge and satisfaction of what was due to him from his guardian in his fiduciary character; of which it is necessary that the proof should be full and satisfactory. And the bond being for a debt which was fiduciary, it could not lose that character by lapse of time. It continues to be fiduciary until it is satisfied."

See principal case also cited with approval on this subject in Yerby v. Lynch, 3 Gratt. 485, 496, 504, 505, 512, 513; Barnum v. Frost, 17 Gratt. 418.

May, for the Plaintiff in Error.

577 *November 17. The PRESIDENT delivered his opinion.

The Record exhibits a case, in which it appears that there were several irregularities in the proceedings, all of which I think are cured, no advantage having been taken of them in the pleadings. The suit was instituted by Thomas Atkinson, as surviving Justice of Dinwiddie County, at the relation of Mary W. Lanier, against her Guardian, William Wills, and his surety, John Hamlin, on the Guardian's Bond, taken to the Justices of Dinwiddie County, in the usual form. The Writ was returned executed on Wills, and Hamlin not found. At the subsequent Rules, an Alias was sued out against Hamlin, and returned executed; and thereupon a Declaration was filed against both on the Guardian's Bond, of which profert is made, and breaches of the condition assigned, which are set out in the Declaration. Afterwards, a conditional order is entered against Wills, and is subsequently confirmed against him, he having been arrested, and not appearing. At a subsequent rule-day, and after a continuance of the cause as to Wills, by Law, there being no Court held in the month of October, 1823, a conditional Judgment is entered against Hamlin, also, and at another day at Rules confirmed against him, and a Writ of Enquiry awarded, as in the case of Wills. At a subsequent Term, the suit is entered abated by the death of the Defendant, without saying which. At the next Term the cause is continued for revival until the next Term. Then dropping the suit against Wills, as it would seem from the after-proceedings, at the next Term a Writ of Sci. Fa. is sued out against the Defendant, as Administrator of Hamlin, reciting that action to have been against him as co-obligor of Wills, the Guardian: the Sci. Fa. is returned, "came too late to hand to execute," and the suit is again continued, without noticing what suit, but it must be presumed the suit on the Sci. Fa., until the next Term, and then an Alias Scire Facias is sued out, and 578 being executed, as appears by the *return of it, and the Defendant failing to appear at Rules and plead, an Office-

Judgment is entered against him, and a Writ of Enquiry awarded. At another Term the suit is continued till the next Term, when the Defendant by his Attorney, pleaded to the Declaration, "conditions performed," to which the Plaintiff replied generally, and it was ordered that the Judgment in the Office be set aside, whereupon came a Jury, who found a general verdict for the Plaintiff, for the debt in the Declaration, to be discharged by the payment of $267, with interest, and Judgment was entered accordingly.

The Scire Facias sued out against the Defendant, was in the nature of an action against him, which may be released by that name, (Litt. 505; Co. Litt. 290;) and might have been demurred to. Having failed to demur, or to plead any variance between it and the proceedings on which it issued, (Paradise's Adm'rs v. Cole & Henderson, 6 Munf. 218,) it must now be understood that Wills died first, and that the action survived against Hamlin, the intestate of the defendant, and upon his death, (after the death of Wills, the principal,) was properly revived by the Scire Facias against the Defendant, as Administrator of Hamlin.

The errors insisted on in the Bill of Exceptions, are of a different character. The first, is to the admission of the testimony of Robert Lanier, who gave evidence that he, as the Administrator of his mother, had paid to William Wills, the Guardian of Mary Lanier, the sum of about $300, at different times in the years 1808-'9 and '10, it being the amount to which she was entitled from the decedent's estate; that he took the said Will's receipts for the sums so paid; that on the evening before the witness gave evidence, he was requested by the Plaintiff's Counsel to bring the said receipts, but not recollecting where he put them, and thinking it probable he could not find them, he had made no examination for them. Not now deciding whether, if the witness had spoken positively, and with certainty as to the dates and 579 amount of the payments made, *his evidence, if believed by the Jury, would have been equivalent to the receipts themselves, as being of equal degree, the Court is of opinion, that as he could not so speak, his testimony ought not to have been received in the absence of the receipts, unless it had appeared that they were lost, or out of the power of the Plaintiff, which is negated by the statement of the witness, that he was requested by the Plaintiff's Counsel to bring them, &c. It was error, therefore, to permit this evidence to go to the Jury.

The second objection is to the Court's refusing to instruct the Jury, that the acceptance by Mary Lanier, the Ward, after she had attained full age, of a Bond from the Guardian individually, for the sum of $373, the balance due on a settlement, and on which partial payments had been made, was a discharge of the security on the Guardian's Bond. A Bond to perform that for which the party was before bound by another Bond, is no discharge of the latter, for accord, it is said, does not mend the matter; 1 Bac. Abr. 43; but, if it could have been available in this case, it ought to have been pleaded. 2 Starkie, p. 26 and 27. It was not matter of evidence on the plea of conditions performed in bar of the specialty on which the suit was brought, though it was prima facie evidence of the amount due by the Guardian, liable to be repelled by evidence on the part of the security. If it could have been pleaded, the proof should have been full, that it was given and received in full satisfaction, as to which there was no evidence. There was no error, therefore, in refusing the instruction asked for by the Defendant. But, for the error in permitting parol evidence to go to the Jury in the absence of the receipts, the Judgment is to be reversed, the cause remanded for further proceedings, the verdict to be set aside, and a new trial awarded, on which the parol evidence is not to be admitted in the absence of the receipts, unless it shall appear that they are lost, or out of the power of the Plaintiff.

The other Judges, all being present, concurred.

I. DEPENDING ON INTENTION.

A. GENERAL RULE.—A mere change of securities of equal dignity is not a novation of the debt unless plainly so intended by the parties. Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. 186. See Gilbert v. Washington, etc., Co., 33 Gratt. 586; Fidelity Ins., etc., Co. v. Shenandoah Valley, etc., Co., 86 Va. 1, 9 S. E. Rep. 759; Moore v. Johnson, 34 Va. 672, 12 S. E. Rep. 918; Stimpson v. Bishop, 82 Va. 199; Yancey v. Mauck, 15 Gratt. 300; Fidelity Loan, etc., Co. v. Engleby, 99 Va. 168, 37 S. E. Rep. 937; Smith v. Watson, 82 Va. 712, 1 S. E. Rep. 96; Taylor v. The Bank of Alexandria, 5 Leigh 471; Feamster v. Withrow, 12 W. Va. 652; State Bank of Va. v. Domestic, etc., Co., 99 Va. 411, 39 S. E. Rep. 141.

1 CASES ILLUSTRATING THE RULE.

How Intention Determined Generally.—Though it is well settled that no mere change in the form of the evidence of a secured debt will discharge it, unless so intended, yet where one security is accepted in satisfaction of another, the debt is discharged, which will be determined generally, by the surrender or retention of the original security. Fidelity Ins., etc., Co. v. Shenandoah, etc., Co., 86 Va. 13, 9 S. E. Rep. 759. See Morris v. Harveys, 76 Va. 726; Niday

v. Harvey, 9 Gratt. 454; Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Engleby, 99 Va. 168, 37 S. E. Rep. 937; Deaton Grocery Co. v. Pepper, 98 Va. 587, 36 S. E. Rep. 988.

a. Changing Place of Payment of Renewed Note.—H. being in want of money, in August 1867, went to the city of Baltimore with a negotiable note for $3,500, blank as to date, and place of payment, but signed by himself and endorsed by five persons, he and they living in Virginia. This note he sold to M. of Baltimore, at a discount; the proper date was inserted and the place of payment fixed at the National Exchange of Baltimore. This note was renewed with the same parties, and in April 1868 B. made a payment on it of $550, and another note to meet the balance was made by the same parties, payable at the same bank, and M. agreed to take this note at the same discount. The last note being paid, M. sent it and all the previous notes and papers connected with the loan, with a statement of the amount due him, to a friend residing in Harrisonburg, with a request that he would take B.'s note for what was due, endorsed by the same parties. This was done, and the note was made payable at the National Bank at Harrisonburg. The taking of the last note was not a novation of the previously existing debt. Bowman v. Miller, 26 Gratt. 331. See Steptoe v. Pollard, 30 Gratt. 629; Karn v. Blackford, 1 Va. Dec. 841.

b. Deed of Trust and Simple Contract Debt.—Whether a bond and deed of trust to secure it, given by a partner after the dissolution of the partnership, for a simple contract debt of the partnership, releases the other partner in equity, depends upon the intention of the parties in giving and taking them; and this intention may be ascertained from the attendant circumstances. Niday v. Harvey, 9 Gratt. 454; Meade v. Grigsby, 26 Gratt. 612; Karn v. Blackford, 1 Va. Dec. 845; Steptoe v. Pollard, 30 Gratt. 629.

c. Deed of Trust as Collateral Security.—And, where the security furnished by a deed of trust, given as an additional or collateral security for the payment of a judgment, is entirely lost to the judgment creditor, he may enforce the judgment for its full amount against other property of the judgment debtor. In the case in judgment, the evidence shows that the deed of trust was not intended as a novation of the debt and that the sale made by the trustee, at which the judgment creditor purchased, was not made subject to the vendor's lien on the property conveyed in trust. Deaton Grocery Co. v. Pepper, 98 Va. 587, 36 S. E. Rep. 988.

d. Store Account Merged, Rule in Equity.—Where principal and a surety execute their bond to a party in settlement of an account due by the principal, at law the account is merged in the bond; but in equity the debt on the account will be held as still subsisting if necessary to do justice between the parties. Meade v. Grigsby, 26 Gratt. 612.

e. Guardian's Bonds.—B's guardian of J and upon J's coming of age B has a settlement with J of his account as guardian, and being found indebted on the account in the sum of $3,000, he executes to J his four bonds, each for $750 payable in one, two, three and four years, with interest. B pays the interest during his life and a part of the principal, and was, up to the war, able to pay the whole. The giving and taking these bonds was not a novation of the debt, but the debt due from B to J continued to be a fiduciary debt, and entitled to rank as such in the administration of B's estate. Smith v. Blackwell, 31 Gratt. 291. See Tilson v. Davis, 32 Gratt. 92; Hamlin v. Atkinson, 6 Rand. 574.

And, a bond given by a guardian on a settlement with his ward after she comes of age is no discharge of the guardian's bond previously given by the guardian and his sureties. Hamlin v. Atkinson, 6 Rand. 574. See Smith v. Blackwell, 31 Gratt. 201.

B. EVIDENCE.

1. BOND AS PROOF OF AMOUNT DUE.—A bond given by a guardian on a settlement with his ward after she comes of age is no discharge of the guardian's bond previously given by the guardian and his sureties, and it cannot be given in evidence under the plea of conditions performed in bar of the specialty, though it may be given in evidence as proof of what is due. Hamlin v. Atkinson, 6 Rand. 574.

2. INTENTION TO NOVATE MUST BE MADE CLEAR.—And those who rely upon a satisfaction and discharge of the original debt by the creation of a new obligation must make it clear that the intention of the parties was to extinguish the original debt and create a new one. Fidelity Loan, etc., v. Engleby, 99 Va. 168, 37 S. E. Rep. 957; State Bank of Va. v. Domestic Sewing, etc., Co., 99 Va. 411, 39 S. E. Rep. 141.

Scire Facias, appended to Kyles v. Ford, 2 Rand. 1.

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

A. SCIRE FACIAS AN ACTION.—A scire facias to revive a suit, is in the nature of an action, and may be released by that name. Hamlin v. Atkinson, 6 Rand. 574.

B. RIGHT OF REVIVOR STATUTORY.—The right of revivor is a statutory right, and in the absence of a statute authorizing it, no suit can be revived. Ashby v. Harrison, 1 Pat. & H. 1.

C. RULES GOVERNING PROCEEDINGS.—A scire facias, to revive a suit or action, decree or judgment, can only be issued in the suit to be revived; and if the suit was in equity, the scire facias must be in equity, and be governed by the rules of that court; and if the action was at law, the proceedings must conform to the rules of that court. Garrison v. Myers, 12 W. Va. 335.

II. NECESSITY FOR REVIVAL.

A. DEATH OF LUNATIC.—Where, pending a suit against a lunatic represented by his committee, the lunatic dies, the committee ipso facto becomes functus officio and the suit abates, and must be revived and proceed in the name of the lunatic's personal representative and heirs; and all proceedings had after lunatic's death and before such revival, are void. Paxton v. Stuart, 80 Va. 371.

B. DEATH OF CREDITOR CONSENTING TO JUDICIAL SALE OF DEBTOR'S LAND.—Where a decree of sale has been entered in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien, and a judgment creditor of the vendee, whose judgment binds his real estate, agrees to a private sale provided that after paying the vendor he should receive half the residue, and the purchase failed, it is error to order a resale without reviving the suit as to his administrator, where the judgment creditor has died, since by his consent to the first sale, such creditor becomes a party to the suit, and he may file a bill to review such decree. Ayers v. Alphin, 88 Va. 416, 13 S. E. Rep. 899.

C. WHERE ACTION SURVIVES TO OR AGAINST COPLAINTIFFS OR DEFENDANTS.—Where one of four plaintiffs in an action of detinue dies, it is error to award a scire facias to revive the action in the name of his executor, since such an action survives. Rose v. Burgess, 10 Leigh 186.

So, where one of two joint plaintiffs in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, dies. Tompkins v. Vintroux, 3 W. Va. 148.

So where one, of several plaintiffs suing on an indemnifying bond, dies. Beckham v. Duncan, 1 Va. Dec. 669.

So where one of several joint defendants in an action on a joint contract dies before verdict. Henning v. Farnsworth, 41 W. Va. 548, 23 S. E. Rep. 663.

In the case of a bill in equity against two persons, who have been auctioneers and partners, where one dies pending the suit; it is not necessary to revive the suit against the representative of the decedent; the plaintiff may proceed against the survivor alone. Townes v. Birchett, 12 Leigh 173. See also, Cunningham v. Smithson, 13 Leigh 33.

D. DEATH AFTER VERDICT OR FINAL DECREE.—If a party die after verdict, the fact does not abate the suit or call for revival. Laldley v. Jasper, 49 W. Va. 526, 39 S. E. Rep. 169.

Where a defendant dies after final decree, it is not necessary to suggest his death and revive the suit against his heirs in order to obtain a rule against persons not parties to the suit, but in possession of land decreed to the plaintiff. Trimble v. Patton, 5 W. Va. 432.

E. PROCEEDINGS OUTSIDE THE CAUSE.—If in a chancery cause land has been sold, and a sale confirmed, and a rule issued against the purchaser to show why the land should not be resold, to which rule the purchaser answers, and the evidence to overrule and support his answer is all taken, and the plaintiff in the original cause then dies, the original cause not having been revived, but the proceedings on the rule having been revived, the court has jurisdiction to render a decree on the proceedings under the rule. Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438.

F. VALIDITY OF CONSENT ORDERS.—Where no scire facias has ever issued against the heir of a deceased defendant, an order of dismissal "agreed" is not binding on them and hence is not binding on the plaintiff, so as to bar another action. Stockton v. Copeland, 30 W. Va. 674, 5 S. E. Rep. 143.

G. PRESENCE OF PROPER PARTIES IN ANOTHER SUIT.—Where the sole defendant in two causes dies before decree, and in one case the cause had never been revived and in the other had been revived by consent as to the executor alone, and not in the name of the widow and heirs, who were necessary parties, though the causes are heard by consent, along with a third suit, in which the necessary parties in the former suit were before the court, the decree in the three causes will be reversed, and sent back to be revived as to the proper parties in the two former suits. Callaghan v. Circle, 12 W. Va. 563.

III. WHAT PROCEEDINGS REVIVABLE.

A. GENERAL RULE.—Any action may be revived if it were originally maintainable by or against the personal representative, if a personal action, and if a real or mixed action, by or against the heir or devisee. Stockton v. Copeland, 30 W. Va. 674, 5 S. E. Rep. 143; Taylor v. Rightmire, 8 Leigh 468.

In Cunningham v. Sayre, 21 W. Va. 440, it was held that the provision of the Code, ch. 127, § 2, that "if a plaintiff or defendant dies pending any action whether the cause of action would survive at common law or not, the same may be revived and prosecuted to judgment and execution, in the same manner" as if it were a cause of action arising out of contract, was not intended to create any new right and give an action to the heir, devisee or representative which he had not at common law, but only to avoid the great inconvenience arising from following the technical rule of the common law in abating actions, when the personal representative, heir or devisee might bring another suit to accomplish substantially the same object.

Upon the death of a defendant in detinue, if his administrator consent that the cause shall stand revived against him, such consent places the cause in the same situation that it would be in after the service of a scire facias against the administrator, alleging that the property had come to his possession and was detained by him. Greenlee v. Bailey, 9 Leigh 536.

B. ACTION OF DETINUE.—An action of detinue cannot be revived against an executor unless the chattel demanded actually come into his possession, and such fact must appear by suggestion in the scire facias, or upon the return of a scire facias executed. The plaintiff should file a count alleging such possession, otherwise the scire facias will be bad on demurrer. Catlett v. Russell, 6 Leigh 344; Allen v. Harlan, 6 Leigh 42; Greenlee v. Bailey, 9 Leigh 526.

C. UNLAWFUL DETAINER.—Prior to the adoption of the Code of West Virginia, it was held that the proceeding of unlawful detainer is incapable of revival on the death of the defendant. Chapman v. Dunlap, 4 Gratt. 86. Or of the plaintiff. Moran v. Eldridge, 2 W. Va. 574.

But see Cunningham v. Sayre, 21 W. Va. 440, set out ante under "General Rule." III. A.

D. ACTION FOR SLANDER.—An action for slander abates on the death of the defendant, since it does not survive against his executor or administrator. Hook v. Hancock, 5 Munf. 546.

E. ACTION FOR DAMAGES TO LAND.—A proceeding to recover damages to land for injuries occasioned by the building of a dam, is revivable on the death of the plaintiff, in the name of his administrators, but not his heirs. Upper Appomattox Co. v. Hardings, 11 Gratt. 1.

F. WRIT OF RIGHT.—Where a writ of right abated by the death of the tenant in 1812, the abatement being entered of record, the suit could not be revived against the heirs of the tenant in 1890, under the Act of 1819, 1 Rev. Code, ch. 128, § 37, that statute being prospective. Lovell v. Arnold, 3 Leigh 16.

But under the statute, where a writ of right is brought against a feme life tenant, who dies, and the demandants revive the action against her heirs at law, though they claim and hold the land in controversy, not as heirs at law, but as devisees under the will of their father, the demandants may revive against the heirs of the first tenant; and they may defend the action by showing title in themselves, however derived. Davis v. Teays, 3 Gratt. 283.

G. APPLICATION FOR PERMISSION TO ERECT A MILLDAM.—If prior to the Code of 1849, any party resisting an application for permission to build a dam died, the proceeding might have been revived against his heirs, not by virtue of any statute authorizing revivals, but from the very nature of the statutory proceeding by the writ of ad quod damnum. If there is doubt about this, however, the comprehensive language of the new Code, in respect to revivals, leaves no room for doubt as to any such case arising since that Code. Hale v. Burwell, 2 Pat. & H. 608.

H. TRESPASS QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT.—An action of trespass quare clausum fregit, is not converted into an action de bonis asportatis, by an allegation in the declaration, that trees cut were carried away; and therefore, the rule actio personalis moritur cum persona applies to such an action. Harris v. Crenshaw, 3 Rand. 14. See also, Tompkins v. Vintroux, 3 W. Va. 148.

I. JOINT ACTION.—Where one of two or more plaintiffs or defendants in a joint action dies pending the suit, and the action survives to or against the coplaintiffs or defendants, it is not revivable in the name of or against the personal representative of the deceased party. As to plaintiff, see Tompkins v. Vintroux, 3 W. Va. 148. As to defendant, see Henning v. Farnsworth, 41 W. Va. 548, 23 S. E. Rep. 663.

J. WAIVER OF OBJECTION.—Where one coplaintiff in a joint action of trespass q. c. f. dies, if the action is revived by consent in the name of the sole devisee of the decedent, no objection can be afterwards raised by the parties consenting. Tompkins v. Vintroux, 3 W. Va. 148.

IV. PARTIES.

A. PLAINTIFF.

Administrator de Bonis Non.—Upon the death of a surviving executor it is competent and proper to revive the suit in the name of the administrator de bonis non. Bell v. Humphrey, 8 W. Va. 1.

Administrator of Husband.—In a suit by husband and wife, for the recovery of personal property in her right, if the husband dies, the right survives to her; and on her death, the suit should not be revived in the name of his administrator. Vaughan v. Wilson, 4 Hen. & M. 452.

Next Friend of Infant.—In Wilson v. Smith, 22 Gratt. 493, it was held that it was not proper to revive a suit in the name of a next friend of an infant heir, but some person should be allowed to prosecute the suit as next friend, for the infant, which may be done as well in some subsequent order as in the order reviving the suit.

Second Committee of Lunatic.—There being no statute authorizing it in 1824, the time of suing out the scire facias in this case, a suit in the name of the committee of a lunatic who was removed by an order of court after the institution of the suit, could not be revived at that time in the name of the committee appointed to succeed him. Ashby v. Harrison, 1 Pat. & H. 1.

Personal Representative of Deceased Joint Plaintiff.—Where one of several joint plaintiffs in an action of trespass q. c. f. dies, pending the action, the action cannot be revived in the name of the personal representative of the deceased plaintiff, since the action survives to the other joint plaintiffs. Tompkins v. Vintroux, 3 W. Va. 148.

Caveat Cases.—The executor of the caveator who is directed to sell the land is the proper party in whose name to revive a caveat, the devisees of the proceeds of sale should not be joined. Caruthers v. Eldridge, 12 Gratt. 670.

Cause Proceeding for Rents and Profits Only.—Where a decree has been rendered confirming a partition and decreeing a conveyance, and the cause was proceeding for the rents and profits only, on the death of the plaintiff, it is proper to revive the cause in the name of his executors only, and not his heirs, the executors being entitled to the rents and profits. Ruffners v. Lewis, 7 Leigh 720.

Suit for Partition.—Where the plaintiff in a suit for the partition of land dies pending the suit, his administrators with the will annexed are not necessary parties, but their joinder will do no harm if the proper parties are also made. Wilson v. Smith, 22 Gratt. 493.

Where the plaintiff in a suit for partition dies, it is proper to revive the suit in the name of his widow and infant son, they being his sole real representatives. Wilson v. Smith, 22 Gratt. 493.

B. DEFENDANT.

Administrator of Committee of Lunatic.—In Paradise v. Cole, 6 Munf. 218, the question was raised but not decided, whether a suit against the committee of an insane person could be revived against the administrator of such person, if such committee died during the pendency of the action.

Administrator de Bonis Non.—Where, pending a suit to recover a claim against the estate of a testator, the executor dies, it is proper to revive the suit against the administrator de bonis non, c. t. a. of such testator. Jones v. Reid, 12 W. Va. 350.

Representative of Deceased Joint Defendant.—If one of two or more defendants in an action at law upon a joint contract die before verdict, the suit abates as to the dead one, and cannot be revived and proceed against his representative and the survivor. Hennings v. Farnsworth, 41 W. Va. 548, 23 S. E. Rep. 663.

Suit for Conveyance of Land.—A suit in chancery for a conveyance of land, in case the defendant dies before a final decree, ought to be revived against his heirs and devisees, and all other persons holding, claiming, or in any manner interested, under him, in the land in question. Key v. Lambert, 1 Hen. & M. 330.

C. UNNECESSARY PARTIES.—Where the suit is revived in the names of the proper parties, the fact that unnecessary parties are also joined, is immaterial. Wilson v. Smith, 22 Gratt. 493. See also, Caruthers v. Eldridge, 12 Gratt. 670, infra. "Waiver of Objections."

D. WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.—If, pending a suit against the committee of an insane person, the latter die, and a scire facias to revive the suit be issued against his administrators, who thereupon appear by counsel, and go to trial, on the issue joined between the plaintiffs and the committee; they cannot take objection in the appellate court, that the suit ought not to have been revived against them. Paradise v. Cole, 6 Munf. 218.

Where a caveat is revived in the name of the executor of the caveator, who is directed to sell the land, and the devisees of the proceeds of the sale; and no objection is taken thereto until after the verdict, the executor being the proper party, the irregularity of joining the others with him will then be disregarded. Caruthers v. Eldridge, 12 Gratt. 670.

So where one coplaintiff in a joint action of trespass q. c. f. dies, and the case is revived in the name of a sole devisee of the deceased party by consent, no objection can be made thereafter by either of the parties consenting. Tompkins v. Vintroux, 3 W. Va. 148.

V. PROCEEDINGS FOR REVIVAL.

A. FORM.

Death of Plaintiff.—"Before the passage of any statute law, when a sole plaintiff died intestate his representative, his administrator or heirs, as the case might be, or both if each were interested, had a right by a bill of revivor to revive a cause in equity and proceed in it to a final decree. But in such a case this right of revival, if the cause of action itself survived, was, in the case put, absolute, and the parties filing the bill had only to prove that they were the representatives of the deceased, if this were denied, and the cause was as a matter of course revived. Both in England and in the various states of this union it was therefore wisely considered by the legislatures, that in such a case it was entirely unnecessary to require the representatives of the deceased plaintiff to file a formal bill of revivor, and that a simple motion with or without notice or a scire facias to revive the cause was all that was necessary to effect all the objects of a formal bill of revivor. In such case, under the statute law of Virginia in existence prior to 1810, on the decease of the plaintiff his representative might revive a chancery cause by scire facias without filing a formal bill of revivor; and this statute has been ever since continued as law both in Virginia and in this state. See Vaughan v. Wilson, 4 Hen. & M. 480; 1 R. C. of Va. of 1819, p. 497, § 38; Code of Va. 1873, ch. 167, § 4; Code W. Va., ch. 127, § 4. And in case of the plaintiff's death it was provided by act of Virginia passed March 7, 1826, see Sup. Rev. Code, pp. 130, 178, that in a suit of equity, if the plaintiff died, the cause might, unless cause be shown to the contrary, be revived in the name of his administrator or heir, etc., on motion without any notice; and this has continued the statute law both of Virginia and West Virginia. Code of Va. 1873, ch. 167, § 4; Code of W. Va., ch. 127, § 4." Reid v. Stuart, 30 W. Va. 882; Gainer v. Gainer, 30 W. Va. 390, 4 S. E. Rep. 494; Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 82; Wilson v. Smith, 22 Gratt. 493; Vaughan v. Wilson, 4 Hen. & M. 480.

These same statutory provisions are applicable to actions at law. Stockton v. Copeland, 30 W. Va. 674, 5 S. E. Rep. 143.

Under the Code, § 3303, declaring that a defendant who files a plea or account of set-off shall be deemed to have brought an action against the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff shall not, after such plea or account is filed, dismiss his cause without defendant's consent, the filing of a plea of set-off does not make the party filing the plea the plaintiff, and the original plaintiff the defendant, so as to deprive the original plaintiff's personal representatives on his death pendente lite from reviving the action by motion, as authorized by Code, § 3308. Kinzie v. Riely, 100 Va. 709, 42 S. E. Rep. 672.

Death of Defendant.—A chancery cause, upon the death of the defendant may be revived either by the filing of a bill of revivor, or by scire facias. Bock v. Bock, 24 W. Va. 589; Vaughan v. Wilson, 4 Hen. & M. 480.

At Law.—In the case of the death of a defendant, the cause can only be revived against his personal representative, heirs or devisees by scire facias; for when a new defendant is to be brought into a suit it can only be done by the consent of such party, or by scire facias, as the right to revive by motion is confined by the statute, where the party who has died was plaintiff or appellant. The cause is not revived by order of the court directing a scire facias to be issued for that purpose, nor yet by the return of the scire facias executed upon the parties named therein, but by the order of the clerk entered at rules, or of the court entered in term by the consent of such parties, or upon the return of the scire facias, that the case proceed in the name of the proper parties. It is apparent, therefore, that a scire facias which failed to set out the names of the new parties to be brought into the suit would be utterly futile, as the same could never be executed. The action having abated by the death of the only defendant, no further proceeding therein could be taken, which could in any manner affect the rights of his heirs until they had been made defendants in the suit. Stockton v. Copeland, 30 W. Va. 674, 5 S. E. Rep. 143.

Bill of Revivor Not Abolished.—"While under these statutes a bill of revivor has long been disused in Virginia and in West Virginia and indeed in England, and the various states of this union, yet there is nothing in our statute law which prevents it from being used, if the parties entitled to revive a chancery cause when the plaintiff dies, choose to resort to this bill of revivor. Reid v. Stuart, 20 W. Va. 382; Gainer v. Gainer, 30 W. Va. 390, 4 S. E. Rep. 424; Bock v. Bock, 24 W. Va. 589.

Petition or Bill of Revivor.—If in such a case the defendant files, what he styles a petition, but which has in it all the allegations, which would be necessary to be made in a bill of revivor, and prays that the cause may be revived in the names of the proper representatives of the deceased plaintiff, the court will regard this as a bill of revivor, though it be styled a petition. Reid v. Stuart, 20 W. Va. 382.

B. SERVICE OF PROCESS.

Resident Parties.—A suit cannot be revived against a resident party unless there is an appearance for him or process returned executed. Duguid v. Patterson, 4 Hen. & M. 445.

Nonresident Parties.—There has been no instance of an order of publication, against an absent defendant, without original process; and the practice has always been to issue process, to revive, as well against the absent as home defendants; and then to make publication, in order to a revival of the suit; and so this case was revived accordingly. Yates v. Payne, 4 Hen. & M. 413; Duguid v. Patterson, 4 Hen. & M. 445.

So in Duguid v. Patterson, 4 Hen. & M. 445, it was held that a suit could not be proceeded in as against nonresident defendants until it had been revived on order of publication for two months, and a report, under an order for an account made before the revival of the suit, was set aside.

By Whom.—A scire facias to revive a suit in this court, which abates by the death of either party, must be served "by the sheriff or other officer to whom the same is directed;" the service thereof by a private individual, though proved by affidavit, not being sufficient. Anonymous, 4 Hen. & M. 401.

C. DEFENCE.—Objections to a scire facias to revive a suit cannot be made on motion; it should be by plea or demurrer, or if, at the hearing, the party do not entitle himself to revive, the suit may be dismissed. Vaughan v. Wilson, 4 Hen. & M. 480. See also, Hamlin v. Atkinson, 6 Rand. 574.

D. TIME OF REVIVAL.—If a scire facias to revive a cause is returnable to one term of court, revival is not confined to that term, but may be entered at a subsequent term. Laidley v. Jasper, 49 W. Va. 525, 38 S. E. Rep. 160.

In Virginia a party on whom process to revive is served, is allowed one term from the return day of such process to prepare for trial. Minor v. Jones, 4 Hen. & M. 480.

But executors and administrators may waive such rule of court, it being for their benefit, and try the cause. Chew v. Hoe, 4 Hen. & M. 489.

E. ORDER OF REVIVAL.

Omission of Christian Names.—Where an order of revival suggests the death of the plaintiff, and that the suit be revived and proceeded in, in the name of "J & L, administrators with the will annexed, — Wilson, infant son and sole heir, and — Wilson, widow and devisee of said John W. Wilson, deceased." Though the christian names of the infant child and the widow are omitted, they are sufficiently described to identify them. Wilson v. Smith, 22 Gratt. 493.

VI. RIGHTS OF DEFENDANT.

A. RIGHT TO REVIVE.—As a general rule the plaintiff in a chancery suit can abandon his cause at his pleasure; and if having this right he dies, his representatives, heirs or administrators, or both, to whom his interest survives, alone, and not the defendants, have a right in such a case, to have the cause revived. But when the defendants have acquired such an interest in the cause, that the plaintiff would not be allowed to dismiss it at his pleasure, as where there has been an order of reference in the cause such that, if a balance should be found in favor of the defendant, he would be entitled to a decree against the plaintiff, and in that stage of the cause the plaintiff dies, the defendant will have a right to revive by bill of revivor or by statutory modes. Reid v. Stuart, 20 W. Va. 382.

B. RIGHT TO HASTEN REVIVAL BY PLAIN-TIFF.—The defendants may hasten the prosecution or discontinuance of the suit by suggesting the death of the plaintiff on the record, and, if no steps are taken to revive the suit at or before the second term of the court next after that at which there may have been a suggestion on the record of the death of the plaintiff, the court ought to enter an order discontinuing the suit; which order can never, after the adjournment of the court, be set aside, though the court may refuse to enter such order, or may set it aside, at any time during the term of the court, if good cause be shown why the suit should not be discontinued. Gainer v. Gainer, 30 W. Va. 390, 4 S. E. Rep. 424; Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 82.

So where the complainant in a bill of injunction dies, after answer filed, and before a decision of the cause, an order may be obtained, on the motion of the defendant, that, unless the representatives of the complainant shall appear, within a certain time fixed by the court, and cause the suit to be revived in their names, the injunction shall stand dissolved. Carter v. Washington, 1 Hen. & M. 203.

So where the defendant dies, after filing his answer to a bill of injunction, and before a decision of the cause, an order may be obtained, on the motion of his representatives, that, unless the complainant, within a certain time fixed by the court, shall revive the suit against them, the injunction shall stand dissolved. Kenner v. Hord, 1 Hen. & M. 204; White v. Fitzhugh, 1 Hen. & M. 1.

But where four plaintiffs in equity unite in the same bill, praying injunction to stay proceedings on four several judgments at law against them respectively, on grounds of equity common to all, and the bill being exhibited against five parties defendants, an injunction is awarded; and, pending suit, two of plaintiffs and three of defendants die; and chancellor makes an order, that unless living plaintiffs, and representatives of deceased plaintiffs, revive the injunction, in name of representatives of deceased plaintiffs, against representatives of deceased defendants, on or before a given day, the injunction shall stand and be dissolved; this order is irregular and erroneous, and of course a decree dismissing the plaintiff's bill based upon such order is erroneous, being in accordance with the order. McKays v. Hite, 2 Leigh 145.

If the court is satisfied that the plaintiff's death has been suggested by the defendant, without any knowledge on his part that he is really dead, but only for the purpose of delay, the court may render a final decree in the cause then ready for such action, and disregard such suggestion. Gillespie v. Bailey, 12 W. Va. 70.

VII. REVIVAL BY CONSENT.

See supra, II, F; II, G; III, J; IV, D.

VIII. PRESUMPTION IN APPELLATE COURT.

It is the defendant's duty to show cause if he can, against the revival of the decree; the mere filing of his pleas is not sufficient, and the whole record being before the chancellor, where the scire facias recites sufficient of the record to show that the decree ought to have been revived, if it is revived the appellate court will presume in the absence of the record that it fully justified the court in its action. Garrison v. Myers, 12 W. Va. 330.

Where two obligors are sued, and both die pending the proceedings, though it is not expressed which of them died first; on a sc. fa. against the administrator of one of them, who does not demur to the scire facias nor plead a variance between it and the proceedings on which it issued, but pleads to issue, it must be understood that the other obligor died first, and that the action survived against the obligor, against whose representative the scire facias was sued out. Hamlin v. Atkinson, 6 Rand. 574.

IX. REVIVAL OF APPELLATE PROCEEDINGS.

See monographic note on "Appeal and Error" appended to Hill v. Salem, etc., Turnpike Co., 1 Rob. 263.

Revival Must Be in Name of Parties Specifically.—

Where the appellee dies, pending the appeal, it is not sufficient that the suit has been revived by consent of parties as to his heirs and representatives in their general character, without naming them, it must be revived against them specifically. Southall v. McKeand, Wythe 95.

The administrator d. b. n. upon the death of the administrator, may appeal from a decree against his administrator without a revival of the judgment. Miller v. Neff, 33 W. Va. 197, 10 S. E. Rep. 378.

Equitable Relief—Judgment at Law—When Granted.*—It is not the province of Courts of Equity to see that justice is done, in the abstract, in all possible cases, but only to lend its aid, when from any cause, without his own default or neglect, a party Defendant at Law, cannot have justice done him in the Courts of Law; and this is true, where the discounts, abatements or damages, which are claimed to be set-off in Equity, arise out of a breach of the same contract on which the Judgment at Law is founded.

*See monographic note on "Judgments" appended to Smith v. Charlton, 7 Gratt. 435; monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Phlippen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

The principal case is cited with approval in Hudson v. Klue, 9 Gratt. 384.

Same—Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Therefore, where C. bound himself to pay 100l. to R., for grain to be delivered by him for a fixed price, and within a certain time, and R. bound himself to C. by Bond to deliver grain of 100l. value, and R.'s Administrators sued C. at Law, and recovered Judgment for the 100l., Equity will not relieve C.; for, his payments and discounts were a proper subject of a defence at Law; or, if R. failed to comply with his contract, C.'s remedy was at Law on the Bond executed by R.

This was an appeal from a Decree of the Superior Court of Chancery for the Richmond District, reversing a Decree of the County Court of Buckingham, by which a Bill of Injunction, obtained by the Appellants, had been perpetuated. The Chancellor dissolved the Injunction, and dismissed the Bill. No other statement of the case is necessary than that which is contained in the following opinion.

Johnson, for the Appellants.

The Attorney General, for the Appellees.

November 24. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion.

In January, 1793, Frederick Cabell, as agent for his father, John Cabell, contracted with Roberts for 100l. worth of corn and wheat, at stipulated prices, for the use of his Iron Works in the County of Greenbrier, and executed a Bond to Roberts, in his father's name, for the 100l. At the same time, Roberts executed his Obligation to John Cabell, to deliver 100l. worth of grain to him, one half as it was wanted, the other by the 25th of December, 1793. In October, Cabell sold his Iron Works to Crawford, and Crawford stipulated to pay all Cabell's debts in Greenbrier and neighbourhood, out of the purchase money. Roberts, having delivered a part of the grain to Cabell, agreed to deliver the balance to Crawford, and to look to him for the 100l., which Crawford agreed to pay him, but Roberts did not agree to give up Cabell's liability. So that Crawford was Cabell's agent to receive the balance of the grain, and bound to him to pay the price of the whole to Roberts. In October, 1793, Cabell removed to Buckingham County, where Roberts' Administrators sued him upon his Bond in 1804, and obtained a Judgment by default. Cabell obtained an Injunction to this Judgment, on the sole ground that he did not execute the Bond, nor know of its existence until some time after it was executed, and had intended to defend the suit at Law, and written to a Lawyer for that purpose, but not knowing the state of the suit, was not present at August Court, when a Judgment by default went against him.

In 1812, Roberts' Administrators answered, objecting to the jurisdiction of the Court, and stating that they were informed, and believed that the Bond was executed by Frederick Cabell, as agent for his father, for the purchase of grain, the whole or greater part of which had been delivered to Cabell, or his agents. In 1818, J. Cabell died, and the suit in Chancery being revived, his Executors filed an amended Bill, stating the substance of the original transactions as before set forth, with the addition, that only eighteen or twenty barrels of grain had been delivered under the contract to Cabell, and that Roberts had agreed to look to Crawford for the price of that, as well as for what he might afterwards deliver to him under the contract, and exonerated Cabell altogether, and that Roberts' Bond, then exhibited, had been mislaid, and found among Frederick Cabell's papers since John Cabell's death. To this, Roberts' Administrators answered as before, denying any agreement to exonerate Cabell, or the payment by Crawford, so far as they knew or 582 believed. "The County Court perpetuated, and the Chancellor dissolved the Injunction. A good deal of testimony was taken, some of which was objected to. The validity of these objections need not be considered, since they do not affect the result of the cause.

Upon the evidence, if I were a juror, I should have very great doubts, but upon the whole should probably conclude, that Roberts had delivered a considerable quantity of grain to Cabell, and perhaps the balance to Crawford, and for whatever he had delivered to both, he had been paid by Crawford. I could not otherwise account for his failure to call on Cabell within the nine or ten years he survived the period of these transactions. But, the County Court in Chancery was not the proper tribunal to determine upon these doubtful facts. They should have been submitted to a Jury, upon Cabell's defence to the action at Law against him, or in an action by Cabell, or his Executors, against the Administrators of Roberts on his Bond. Whatever Crawford had paid Roberts, was a legal discount against Cabell's Bond. And if he had not delivered the whole grain, there was no impediment to recovering satisfaction for it in a suit upon his Bond. It is not the province of a Court of Equity to see that justice in the abstract is done in all possible cases, but only to lend its aid when, from any cause, without his own default or negligence, a party cannot have justice done him in the Courts of Law. Nor does the circumstance, that the discounts, or abatements, or damages, claimed to be set-off in Equity, arise out of a breach of the same contract, upon which the Judgment at Law is founded, form an exception to the general rule, unless there be also some circumstance in the case, which, without the default or negligence of the party, prevented him from availing himself of such a breach by way of defence, or in an action at Law. The cases alluded to in the argument, in which an abatement in the price of land for a deficiency in quantity, has been allowed in Equity in this Court, and in which the payment 583 of the "purchase money has been suspended till some defect in the title should be supplied, form no such exception to the general rule. These have been either cases in which the purchaser has sued in Equity for a specific execution where it was necessary to the relief asked to adjust the price to be paid under the contract, as in Mills v. Bell, 3 Call, 320; Chinn v. Heale, 1 Munf. 63; Grantland v. Wright, 2 Munf. 179, Nelson v. Carrington, 4 Munf. 332; or where the party had accepted a Deed, in which there was no covenant upon which he could recover compensation for the defect of title, or deficiency in the quantity of the land, as in Joliffe v. Hite, 1 Call, 301; Hull v. Cunningham, 1 Munf. 330; Humphreys v. M'Clenachan, 1 Munf. 493; Sexton v. Pickering, 3 Rand. 468; Nelson v. Matthews, 2 Hen. & Munf. 164. The cases in which relief had been given in this Court to the obligor against assignees, after Judgment at Law, upon Equities against the obligee, conform to the general rule. In the leading case of Norton v. Rose, 2 Wash. 233, the Equity was inherent in the original contract, and went to the whole consideration of the obligation upon which no defence or action at Law, even as against the obligee, could be founded. In Pickett v. Morris, Ibid. 255, a legal discount was offered and rejected in the trial at Law, and the party prevented by surprise from putting his case upon the Record, so as to reverse the Judgment by appeal. And in Stockton v. Cook, 3 Munf. 68, the obligor, against whom the assignee, had obtained a Judgment at Law, upon a Bond given in consideration of the purchase of land, had a conveyance from the obligees, with a covenant against incumbrances; there was an incumbrance, and although this was not a subject that could be discounted at Law, the obligor could have maintained an action at Law against the obligees, and have recovered the full amount of the incumbrance. He was relieved in Equity against the Judgment obtained by the assignee. Judge Fleming dissenting, amongst other reasons, alleging that the remedy of the 584 "Plaintiff in Equity, (if he was entitled to any,) was against the obligees. The Bill, however, charged that the obligees were insolvent, which, if true, rendered the remedy at Law against them unavailing.

During the present Term, it has been held that unliquidated damages, arising out of the same contract on which the Judgment sought to be enjoined was founded, cannot be set-off in Equity. Webster v. Couch, ante p. 519.

I think the Decree of the Chancellor was right, and should be affirmed. If the Appellants should suffer any injury from this, it is not from any defect in the Law, but the consequence of their not availing themselves of their legal remedies, and of applying to any improper tribunal.

tion, and not liable to be sued at Law, on claims either against the Lunatic himself, or his estate, as in the case of a Committee appointed under the Statute.

Samuel Turner brought Assumpsit in the Superior Court of Prince George, against Robert Bolling, committee of Mary Anne Bolling, a lunatic, to recover $919 80. There were five counts in the Declaration. The first was indebitatus assumpsit for goods, wares and merchandize sold and delivered to the lunatic before her lunacy. The second was on a quantum valebant for the goods sold and delivered to her. The third was on a quantum meruit, for work and labor done for her. The fourth was indebitatus assumpsit, for money laid out and 585 expended *by the Plaintiff for the use of the lunatic, for money lent and advanced to her; and for money had and received by her to the use of the Plaintiff before her lunacy. All of these four counts charged the assumpsit to be made by her before her lunacy. The fifth count was on an insimul computassent between the Defendant as committee of the lunatic, and the Plaintiff, in which the Defendant was charged to be found in arrears on account of the said lunatic in the sum claimed, and laid the assumpsit by the Defendant himself as committee. Plea, the general issue. On the trial the Jury found for the Plaintiff, subject, however, to the opinion of the Court, upon the question here stated. "The goods, &c. for which this action is brought, were furnished by the Plaintiff to the said Mary Anne Bolling, before the Defendant was appointed her committee, and were necessities required for her support, and the preservation of her property, and the Defendant was appointed a committee for the said Mary Anne, by the Superior Court of Chancery for the Richmond District, and not by any County or Corporation Court, in the mode prescribed in the Act of Assembly, and it is submitted to the Court, whether the Defendant is subject to this action. The said Mary Anne, at the time of the delivery of the goods, being in a state of mind which rendered her incapable of contracting." The Court decided in favor of the Plaintiff, and the Defendant appealed.

This is an action of Assumpsit by the Appellee against the Appellant, as the Committee of a lunatic, appointed by 586 *The Chancellor for goods, &c. furnished as necessities for the support of the lunatic, and for the preservation of her property, before the appointment of the Appellant, and when the lunatic was incapable of making any contract. The error in bringing this action was, in not distinguishing it from an action against the committee of a lunatic appointed under the Statute, in a case in which the lunatic is sent to the Hospital and is treated by the Statute as civiliter mortuus, and the committee as an Executor, and responsible in like manner. 1 Rev. Co. ch. 109, § 6, p. 413. A committee appointed by the Chancellor, as in this case, is a mere Commissioner of the Court, managing the person and estate of the lunatic, under the direction of the Chancellor, and having such allowances for the support of the lunatic as may be considered proper, accounting for the management of the estate as a receiver of the Court, removable in its discretion, and is not liable to be sued on claims either against the lunatic or his estate, as in the case of a committee appointed under the Statute. A suit might have been brought against the lunatic herself for any debt incurred before the committee was appointed, and after Judgment her person might have been taken in execution, as in the case of any other debtor. During her lunacy she was incapable of making any contract, and was only liable to be sued for necessities, though no Execution could issue against her estate, that being under the control of the Chancellor; but the Chancellor, either before or after Judgment, may direct the debt to be paid out of her estate. 13 Vessey, 590, Anonymous, and Maddock's Ch. title "Idiot and Lunatic."

The Judgment is therefore to be reversed.

Legacies—When a Charge on Realty.—Although legacies do not stand upon as high ground as debts, yet if the personal fund be inadequate, or if there be expressions in a Will, tending to show that the Testator had the land in his mind, a Court will make them a charge on the land, rather than they shall go unpaid.

Same—Same—Case at Bar.—Therefore, where a single woman, having but little personal property, and real estate of considerable value, having only one brother, who would have been her heir and distributee, by her Will bequeaths pecuniary legacies to two of her friends, as tokens of affection, and makes the brother Executor, and residuary legatee, she must be considered as intending that the legacies should be paid out of the land, and they were decreed to be a charge upon it.

Legacies—When a Charge on Realty.—In Read v. Cather, 18 W. Va. 267, it is said: "Whether a legacy is a charge upon the real estate devised in a will is a question of intention upon the part of the testator. According to the English rule that intention is to be derived exclusively from the provisions of the will; and parol evidence is inadmissible to aid in ascertaining that intention. 1 Rep. Leg. 451 (576, 4 Ed.); Parker v. Fearnley, 2 Sim. & Stu. 462. In Virginia the rule is not so strict; and parol evidence is admissible. Downman v. Rust, 6 Rand. 587; Clark v. Buck, 1 Leigh 490; Trent v. Trent, Gilm. 174. CHANCELLOR KENT thus states the law: that the real estate will not be charged with the payment of legacies, unless the intention of the testator to that effect is expressly declared, or clearly to be inferred from the language and disposition of the will; and that it was not sufficient, that debts or legacies are directed to be paid, that alone does not create the charge; but they must be directed to be first or previously paid, or the devise declared to be made after they are paid. Lupton v. Lupton, 2 Johns. Ch. 614."

To the same effect the principal case is cited in Gaw v. Huffman, 12 Gratt. 633; Hughes v. Tabb, 78 Va. 327; Lee v. Lee, 88 Va. 909, 14 S. E. Rep. 534; Thomas v. Rector, 23 W. Va. 34; Bird v. Stout, 40 W. Va. 46, 20 S. E. Rep. 853; Hogg v. Browning, 47 W. Va. 22, 34 S. E. Rep. 755.

which such charge is made, having conveyed the land in trust for payment of his own debts, and the land being sold by the Trustees, under the Deed, the purchaser having notice of the legacies, is bound to see to the application of the purchase money, and the land held to be chargeable in his hands with the payment of the legacies. So held, not on the ground that the purchaser is guilty of fraud, but on the principle of Caveat emptor.

Olivia Downman and Sarah Downman, filed their Bill in the Superior Court of Chancery at Fredericksburg, against the Appellee, Benjamin D. Rust, both in his own right, and as Executor of Elizabeth H. Rust, and others, to recover certain legacies bequeathed to the Complainants by the said Elizabeth H. Rust. After directing the Executor to pay all just debts of the Testatrix, the Will proceeds in the following words: "It is also my will and desire that my Executor pay to Mrs. Olivia Downman $400 as a small token of my sincere love and gratitude for the parental like love and affection which she has manifested towards me and in the event of the death of Mrs. Olivia Downman before my Executor can make her the said payment, it is my will that the said sum of money be equally divided among her heirs. In like manner it is my will and desire that my Executor pay to Miss Sarah Downman of Moratico $200 as a small token of my love and gratitude for the sisterlike attention she has always paid me to be distributed among her heirs equally in case of her death before my 588 Executor can pay her the said sum of $200." The Testatrix then devises all the rest of her estate, real and personal, in fee simple, to her brother, Benjamin D. Rust, and appoints him Executor. The Bill states, (and the Defendant Rust admits in his Answer,) that the said Rust subsequently qualified as Executor: that the said Elizabeth H. Rust lived for many years before her death in the family of Olivia Downman, the mother of Sarah Downman, and was treated with the utmost tenderness and affection: that Benjamin D. Rust was the only brother of the Testatrix, and that she left neither father, mother, nor sister: that the personal estate of the said Elizabeth H. Rust, at the time of making her Will, and at the time of her death, about a month afterwards, did not amount to more than 60 or 70 dollars. It does not appear that the Testatrix left any debts. Elizabeth H. Rust, when she made her Will and at the time of her death, was seised of a tract of land of considerable value, called "Islington," on the Rappahannock, upon which Benjamin D. Rust entered as Devisee of his sister. On the 1st day of January, 1822, the Defendant Rust conveyed the land in question to Trustees, for certain purposes expressed in the Deed, and subsequently executed another Deed of Trust, conveying the same land to another Trustee, for the purpose of securing a debt due to one David Greenlaw. The land was offered for sale by the Trustee in the last Deed, and the said Greenlaw became the purchaser. It is stated in the Complainants' Bill, and not denied by the Defendants, that the Complainants gave notice of their claim to the Trustee and purchaser, to have their legacies satisfied out of the land. The Bill was filed for a settlement of the account of the Executor, and payment of the legacies out of the personality, if sufficient, but if not, praying that the legacies may be considered as a charge upon the land. Rust, both in his own right, and as Executor, is made a Defendant, and also the Trustees in the two Deeds of Trust, and Greenlaw, a purchaser under one of those Deeds. It is stated in the Bill, that no inventory, appraisement, or account of sales, had been returned.

589 *The Chancellor directed the Executor to settle the account of his administration, and ordered the Bill of the Plaintiffs to be dismissed as to the Trustees, and as to Greenlaw, the purchaser; from which Decree the Plaintiffs appealed.

J. M. Patton, for the Appellants.
Johnson, for the Appellees.

December 17. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.*

Upon this case, two questions arise: 1st. Whether by the Will, the legacies are charged on the lands? 2d. If so, does that charge follow the land into the hands of the purchaser? It would seem almost useless to discuss the first point, since Counsel, so able and so diligent, felt himself obliged to admit, that in the hands of the devisee these lands were chargeable. I will, however, say a few words on the subject. Every question of a charge on land under a Will, is a question of intention. In the case of debts, it is so natural to suppose that a man in that solemn act, intended to be just, that Courts have taken very slight words in a Will to imply a charge upon lands. The Books are full of such cases. Trent v. Trent, in Gilm. Rep. 174, is one of that class. Legacies do not stand on quite so high ground, being voluntary gifts; but, yet every man is supposed to intend that they shall be paid, and to have settled in his mind the fund for their payment: and if there be no fund but land, or if there be expressions tending to show that the Testator had the land in his mind, the Court will turn them upon the land, rather than they should go unpaid. Thus, in Elliot v. Hancock, 2 Vern. 143, Testator devised $1. per annum to his eldest son for 590 forty years, if he should so long live, and to his second *son, whom he made executor and residuary legatee, he devised his real estate in tail, with several remainders over. The Executor paid the annuity for twenty years, and then died. Decreed, the land should be liable to the annuity, though there were no express words to charge it, the devisee being Executor, and the heir, who was disinherited, having no other provision. Alcock v. Sparhawk, 2 Vern. 228, J. S. by his Will devised his lands to his brother (who was his heir at Law,) in fee, and giving sundry legacies, made his brother his Executor, desiring him to see his Will performed. Per Curiam. "The lands are subject and liable even on the face of the Will. Testator needed not to have devised the lands to his brother, for he was his heir at Law, unless he intended his brother should take them, subject to his legacies: but he is devisee and executor, and is desired to see the Will performed; and therefore, a much stronger case than that of Cloudeley v. Pelham, 1 Vern. 411. Note. This Decree was affirmed in Parliament." Ambrey v. Middleton, 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 497, pl. 16. "As to all my worldly estate, I give and dispose thereof in manner following:" and then Testator gave several pecuniary legacies, and several annuities for lives, to be paid by his Executor; and next he devised all the rest and residue of his goods and chattels and estate, to his nephew, Middleton, (the Defendant, and heir at Law to the Testator.) and made him sole Executor. The question was, if the real estate be chargeable with the legacies and annuities, in default of the personal estate? And Cowper Ch. was of opinion, that by the devise of all the rest and residue of his goods, chattels and estate, all his lands did pass to his Executor, and that he took by the Will, and not by descent, as heir at Law; and that the lands so devised to him, were chargeable with the pecuniary legacies and annuities, when the personal estate fell short to satisfy the same, and decreed accordingly.

Compare the case before us with these. The Testatrix a single woman, having one brother, who would have been 591 *her heir and distributee, and having scarcely any personal estate, but real estate to the value of five or six thousand dollars, leaves to Mrs. Olivia Downman, in whose house she had lived, and to Miss Downman, her daughter, to the first $400, and to the last $200, to be paid by her Executor. All the rest of her estate, real and personal, she gives to her brother, and makes him her Executor. She certainly intended that these legacies, given as tokens of love and gratitude, should be paid. Out of what fund? Not the personalty, for she had none; certainly out of the land: and therefore, she devised it to her brother, that he might take it under the Will, and not by descent; and she made him Executor, and directed him to pay the legacies: and the rest of her estate, real and personal, she gave to him. I can have no doubt that under this Will, and the settled course of decisions, the land is chargeable with the legacies.

The second question, does the charge follow the land into the hands of the Defendant, Greenlaw? Was the one most strongly contested. It was not pretended that Greenlaw was a purchaser without notice, nor can he occupy that ground at all. A Defendant, who claims to be a purchaser without notice, must expressly deny notice in his Answer, though it is not charged in the Bill. This is settled Law. Here, it is charged in the Bill, that at the sale under the Deed of Trust, an Agent for the legatees attended, expressly forbade the sale, and gave notice, that the land would be held liable for the legacies; and neither of the Answers denies this allegation. We must consider the question then upon other grounds. Neither do I think this question turns upon the point of fraud, as was strongly contended by the Counsel for the Appellee. Let us first enquire whether the Defendant, Rust, is to be taken as a Trustee, and the land as trust property, so far as relates to the legacies? In discussing the first question, we have come to the conclusion, that the legacies were (in defect of personal property) charges upon 592 the land. There seems *to have been at one time, a difference of opinion, whether a mere charge upon land created a trust, like a conveyance to Trustees, but it is now settled that it does. See Bailey v. Ekins, 7 Ves. 319; Shiphard v. Lutwidge, 8 Ves. 26. Those cases show that it is as much a trust as a direct conveyance or devise to Trustees for the same purpose: the only difference is, that in that case, the trust arises by construction of Equity; while in this, it is produced by the express declaration of the party; and when the trust is in esse, it seems wholly immaterial by what means it has arisen. See Sugd. 335-6. Considering the Executor a Trustee, and this land trust property, so far as the legacies were concerned, the doctrine on which the case of Orr turned has been relied on. 5 Rand. 195. In that case, the party was considered as contracting with Orr, first, in the character of Executor, and secondly, in the character of a full Trustee. In the latter character, it was shown from the cases of Andrew v. Wrigley, 4 Bro. Ch. Cas. 125; Read v. Snell, 2 Atk. 642; Mabank v. Metcalf, 3 Atk. 95, and Ithell v. Beane, 1 Ves. sen. 215, "that a Trustee cannot alien in payment of his own debt." The Deeds of Trust in the case before us, were made expressly and solely, to secure the debts of Rust, and the land was sold to raise those debts. But there was another aspect in which the question was more especially considered in the argument, that is, whether this be a case in which the purchaser, even supposing him to have notice, is bound to see to the application of the purchase money. It was acknowledged, that legacies enumerated, are like scheduled debts, so far as the question, whether the purchaser shall see to the application of the money is concerned. But it was contended, that in no case, either of debts or legacies, was a purchaser bound to look to application, where the charge was not express, but created by implication and construction. The Counsel referred to no case which took this distinction between an express and an implied charge, nor have I 593 been able to find any. All the cases (and there are many cited *by Sugden in 11th Ch.) go upon the distinction between a limited and a general trust. In the first (however created) the purchaser is bound, in the last, he is not. The Counsel placed it on the ground of fraud, and said it would be harsh doctrine, to pronounce it fraudulent in a purchaser to deal with Rust as owner of the land, when there was a clear devise of it to him, and the charge was so far from being clear, that none but a lawyer would detect it. But I see none of the cases, nor of the elementary writers, placing this doctrine on the foot of fraud. It seems to depend rather on the doctrine caveat emptor; he who purchases from another must look to the title, must know the authority of the seller. Whether the charge on the land be express, or implied, if it is a charge, it equally binds, and must be equally protected. Upon the whole, I think that the Decree dismissing the Bill against all but the Executor, must be reversed, and the cause sent back, with directions to the Court below, that for so much as the personal estate shall fall short of paying the legacies, they constitute a charge upon the land.

JUDGES CABELL and COALTER concurred, and the Decree was reversed.

I. REQUISITES OF SALE AND PURCHASE.

Offer and Acceptance.—A mere proposal to sell land does not become a sale until accepted, and notice of acceptance given the proposer. Dyer v. Duffy, 39 W. Va. 148, 19 S. E. Rep. 540.

Acceptance Must Be Unconditional and within Time Limit.—To convert a proposal to sell into a valid contract of sale, it is essential that the acceptance be unconditional, and that notice of the acceptance be communicated to the other party within the time limited, or that within that time some act be done by the plaintiffs which he has expressly or impliedly agreed to treat as notice of the acceptance. Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 S. E. Rep. 743.

And if a condition is affixed by a party to whom the offer is made, or any modification or change in the offer be made or requested, it will in law constitute a rejection of the offer. Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 S. E. Rep. 743.

So a court of equity will not enforce a parol contract for the sale or exchange of land, unless the terms of the contract are admitted or clearly proven. Boggs v. Bodkin, 32 W. Va. 566, 9 S. E. Rep. 891. But by Virginia Code § 2840, no action shall be brought upon any contract, for the sale of real estate unless it be in writing and signed by the party to be charged thereby or his agent.

And where one by writing empowers another to sell land, implying a cash sale, and the agent simply transfers the writing to a third person, without payment of purchase money, it is not a sale. Dyer v. Duffy, 39 W. Va. 148, 19 S. E. Rep. 540.

II. POWER TO SELL INSEPARABLE INCIDENT.

The general rule is that the power to sell is an inseparable incident of the ownership of property, which makes it liable to the owner's debts. McClure v. Cook, 39 W. Va. 579, 20 S. E. Rep. 612.

But where the sale is restricted in the exercise of power which is a part of the dominion of the grantor, not parted with, but retained and exercised for some purpose beneficial to the security of his own right, such as to keep the property bound by a charge created, and imposed upon it, and to hold the grantee to the personal performance of the duties given him in charge, the general rule does not apply. McClure v. Cook, 39 W. Va. 579, 20 S. E. Rep. 612.

Vaughn*, 14 Gratt. 102; Clarke v. Reins, 12 Gratt. 98; McCann v. Jones, 1 Rob. 256; Watts v. Kinney, 3 Leigh 272; Linkous v. Cooper, 2 W. Va. 67; Watson v. Coast, 35 W. Va. 463, 14 S. E. Rep. 249; Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 657; Rucker v. Lowther, 6 Leigh 259.

But where the sale is of such a character, and made under such circumstances, as fully and sufficiently to make known to the purchaser the exact nature of the title he is to expect, as where the sale is made avowedly by an executor under the provisions of the will, or by a sheriff or commissioner under an order of the court, he can of course only demand such title as was in contemplation of the parties when the sale was made. Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 102.

Who Must Enter into Covenants for Title—Exceptions.—With respect to the persons who are bound to enter into covenants it may be observed in general, that all persons who convey lands whereof they are seized to their own use, are bound to enter into the usual covenants for the title of the land conveyed, but where the estate is sold by trustees under a will, a purchaser is not entitled to covenants for the title, and the same rule applies where an estate is sold under an order of a court of equity. Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 681; Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 102.

And a person who is bound to make a title to lands, is bound to execute a deed in the presence of witnesses, or to acknowledge it in such manner, that the person to whom it is made, may have it recorded according to law. Tapp v. Beverley, 1 Leigh 80.

But if a vendor does not affect to have a perfect title, and expressly sells such as he has without special warranty, he is entitled to specific execution without being first required to show a clear title. Broyles v. Bee, 18 W. Va. 514.

"A Good and Indefeasible Title" by an Executor.—An executor selling the land of his testator, by virtue of a power given by the will, is not bound to convey with general warranty, without an agreement to that effect; but to that only with special warranty, against himself and all persons claiming under him; notwithstanding a written agreement, after the sale, that he would make "a good and indefeasible title" to the purchaser; for such agreement is to be understood in reference to the terms of the sale. Grantland v. Wight, 5 Munf. 295.

Defect of Title Cured by Lapse of Time.—Where a vendee of the real estate has had and held possession thereof under title from his vendor, until defect of title has been cured by lapse of time or the statute of limitations, he is not allowed to set up such pretended defect, however defective the title may have been at the time of the purchase. Piedmont Coal & Iron Co. v. Green, 3 W. Va. 55.

And if at the date of the decree of sale, the title, though originally defective, has become good by reason of the purchaser's possession under the statute of limitations, the court may go on to enforce the contract. Core v. Wigner, 32 W. Va. 277, 9 S. E. Rep. 36; McLaugherty v. Croft, 43 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. Rep. 246.

Marketable Title.—A "marketable title" is one that is free from reasonable objection to a reasonable purchaser. Morrison v. Waggy, 48 W. Va. 405, 27 S. E. Rep. 814.

Deed Conveying Title Not Revoked by Death.—A deed duly executed and delivered, which conveys the legal title to real estate to a vendee, although a mere power to sell, is not revoked by the death of the vendor. McNeill v. McNeill, 48 W. Va. 765, 28 S. E. Rep. 717.

Clouded Title Cleared before Decree.—Though the vendee of land has abandoned possession for a technical defect of title, yet upon a bill to enjoin the collection of the purchase money, if the vendor can make a good title at the time of the decree, the vendee is bound to take it. Mays v. Swope, 8 Gratt. 47.

But a purchaser of land being thoroughly informed of defects in the vendor's title, and agreeing nevertheless to pay interest on the purchase money from a certain day, shall not be relieved from paying such interest, on the ground that he could not get possession of part of the land, which he knew at the time of entering into the agreement, was held by another person. Mayo v. Purcell, 3 Munf. 243.

Vendee Not Compelled to Accept Clouded Title.—A vendee for value, purchasing a good title cannot be compelled to accept a litigious or clouded title, if there is reasonable ground to apprehend litigation with regard thereto, although the same may be satisfactory to a lawyer or speculator. Having paid a good price therefor, the vendee has the right to demand a quiet title. Spencer v. Sandusky, 46 W. Va. 582, 33 S. E. Rep. 221.

Vendor May Purchase Outstanding Title.—Where a party sells and conveys, without warranty, a particular claim or title to land, he is not thereby estopped from purchasing a superior adverse or outstanding title and holding the land under a superior title against the grantee of the particular claim or title where there was no fraud or concealment in the sale of the particular claim. Kent v. Watson, 23 W. Va. 563.

Contract to Make Good Deed Includes Good Title.—A contract to make "A good deed" is not confined to the form of the deed, but includes a good title. Christian v. Cabell, 22 Gratt. 82.

Vendor Sells Only Title Vested in Him.—A grant of land is a mere transfer of such title or right thereto as the grantor, at the time of the grant, may hold or have, absolutely or contingently. Western M., etc., Co. v. Peytona, etc. Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 411.

And a grant does not imply an assertion of title in the grantor, or a covenant with the grantee to warrant the land. Western M., etc., Co. v. Peytona, etc., Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 411.

1. WHEN TITLE VESTS IN VENDEE.—The purchaser of real estate is the owner from the date of the contract, when the vendor is in no default, and is prepared to convey a clear title, but he is not the owner till the vendor can make a title according to the contract. Christian v. Cabell, 22 Gratt. 83.

And any loss occurring to the property before the vendor is in a condition to convey a clear unincumbered title must fall on him, and not on the purchaser. Christian v. Cabell, 22 Gratt. 82.

2. VENDOR'S LIABILITY FOR DEFECTS OF TITLE.—The vendor of real estate is not responsible for any defects of title, unless he has bound himself by some covenant or warranty to protect the vendee, or has been guilty of some fraud or concealment. Commonwealth v. McClanachan, 4 Rand. 482; Johnston v. Jarrett, 14 W. Va. 238.

Vendor in Own Right Must Convey with General, and a Lienor with Special Warranty.—A vendor of land in his own right is bound to convey it with general warranty, unless it be otherwise agreed between the parties. But a party who had sold to the vendor, and had retained the legal title, or had some interest in the land, is only required to convey with special warranty. Hoback v. Kilgore, 26 Gratt. 442.

And a trustee to sell, selling property, and such title only, as is vested in him, according to the terms prescribed, and without warranty or fraud, incurs no responsibility to the purchaser. Sutton v. Sutton, 7 Gratt. 234.

Mode of Ascertaining Defects.—In a suit by a vendor to enforce the payment of purchase money under an executory contract for the sale of land, and defendant alleges a defect of title in the vendor, he may have a reference to ascertain the character of the title, or the court may, where the proof raises a doubt as to title, make a reference; but unless the reference be asked by the vendee, or the doubt appears, it is not necessary, and the court may proceed to subject the land to sale for the purchase money. Core v. Wigner, 32 W. Va. 277, 9 S. E. Rep. 36.

What Purchaser Entitled to under Contract for Clear Title.—A contract for the sale of land which provides that the vendor shall convey to the purchaser a clear title, entitles the purchaser to a conveyance of the land with general warranty and free from incumbrances. Kenny v. Hoffman, 31 Gratt. 442; Com. v. McClanachan, 4 Rand. 482.

And a purchaser who has accepted a deed of general warranty, must generally pay the purchase money, and look to the warranty for indemnity against bad title; but if the grantor is insolvent, or the warranty not binding, he will not be compelled to pay, if the title is defective, though he has not yet lost from its defect. Bennett v. Pierce, 45 W. Va. 654, 31 S. E. Rep. 972.

But where the vendor has bound himself to convey the land with covenant of general warranty, he is responsible for defect of title to any part of the land so sold; and a court of equity will not compel the payment of the whole of the purchase money, until the defect is removed; although there has been a conveyance of such land to the vendee. Koger v. Kane, 5 Leigh 606; Clarke v. Hardgrove, 7 Gratt. 399; Renick v. Renick, 5 W. Va. 285; Johnston v. Jarrett, 14 W. Va. 238; Heavner v. Morgan, 41 W. Va. 428, 23 S. E. Rep. 874; Worthington v. Staunton, 16 W. Va. 242.

Effect of Waiving Defects of Title.—A purchaser of land having given bond and security for the price, without getting a good title, it is competent for him to bind his surety, as well as himself, by waiving such a title, as he might otherwise have insisted upon, as a condition precedent to the payment of the money. Ross v. Woodville, 4 Munf. 324.

Defect of Title Grounds for Abandonment.—A purchaser not informed at the time of his purchase of land at auction, that the title to one moiety thereof is vested in infants, and that it can only be obtained by a suit in chancery, may when informed of the fact, refuse to proceed with the purchase, and abandon it. Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 103.

And to sustain a vendee's allegation that the contract was abandoned by implication, the conduct of the vendor ought to be such, as to justify a reasonable man, in believing that he acquiesced. Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call 308.

Defect of Title Ground for Enjoining Collection of Purchase Money.—Equity will enjoin the collection of purchase money on land, on the ground of defect of title, after the vendee has taken possession under conveyance from the vendor, with general warranty, if the title is questioned by a suit either prosecuted or threatened, or if the purchaser can show clearly that the title is defective. Kinports v. Rawson, 29 W. Va. 487, 2 S. E. Rep. 85; Heavner v. Morgan, 41 W. Va. 428, 23 S. E. Rep. 874; Thompson v. Catlett, 24 W. Va. 524.

When a vendor's title is not good, and he brings suit for the purchase money and the vendee sues for a deed, and the court decrees that the money be paid when the deed is delivered, the decree will not be enforced should the vendor's title prove worthless. West v. Shaw, 32 W. Va. 195, 9 S. E. Rep. 81.

Failure of Fiduciary to Pay Over Money Will Not Effect Title.—Where there is a charge upon land by will for the payment of debts, and a sale, which is fairly made, becomes necessary, the failure of the personal representative to pay over the proceeds to the creditors will not effect the title of the vendee. Meeks v. Thompson, 8 Gratt. 134.

3. REASONABLE TIME ALLOWED FOR MAKING TITLE.—As was said in Dresel v. Jordan, 104 Mass. 407: "It is not essential that the vendor had, at the time of the contract, such title and capacity to convey the property, or such means and right to acquire it, as would enable him to fulfill it on his part. It is sufficient if he is able to convey when he is required by the contract or the equities of the case; and, when time is not of the essence of the contract, the vendor will be allowed a reasonable time to obtain a perfect title." Mays v. Swope, 8 Gratt. 46; Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 125; Rader v. Neal, 13 W. Va. 374; Dodson v. Hays, 29 W. Va. 577, 2 S. E. Rep. 415; Reeves v. Dickey, 10 Gratt. 138.

Vendor Chargeable with Rents and Profits on Failure to Make Title.—Where there is a contract for the sale of land, without any day specified for the delivery of the deed and possession, it is supposed to have been intended to be done without unreasonable delay, and in case of a disagreement after the contract the vendor is chargeable with rents and profits. Hundley v. Lyons, 5 Munf. 342.

Knowledge of Defects of Title Bars Relief.—In general, a contract will not be enforced by a court of equity, if the party asking the execution of it has been in default, and the other party will thereby suffer a serious loss, if compelled to carry the contract into effect. But, if the purchaser knew, when he made his contract, that there was a defect in the title, and that it would take a considerable time to remove it; or acquires this knowledge after his purchase, and acquiesces in the delay, or proceeds, with knowledge of the defect, in the execution of the contract; he has no ground of complaint. Vall v. Nelson, 4 Rand. 478; Dodson v. Hayes, 29 W. Va. 77, 2 S. E. Rep. 415.

Title Made Pendente Lite.—Where a vendee of land obtains an injunction to stay the sale thereof under a deed of trust securing a residue of unpaid purchase money thereon, and at the date of the deed therefor to the vendee, the vendor's title to a portion of the land is defective, and who after the injunction is granted procures a deed of release from a third party for such portion, an order granting the injunction is proper until the title is settled, but the procuring and having recorded a deed of release by the vendor is a sufficient settlement of the title to allow the vendor to proceed to collect the unpaid purchase money by a sale of the land, and the vendee ought to recover his costs in the court below. Lovell v. Chilton, 2 W. Va. 410.

4. KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECTIVE TITLE.—Where a purchaser knows, when he makes his contract, that there is a defect in the title, and that it will take a considerable time to remove it, or acquires this knowledge after his purchase, and acquiesces in the delay, or proceeds, with knowledge of the defect, in the execution of the contract, he cannot afterwards complain. Vall v. Nelson, 4 Rand. 478, 481; Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 125; Rader v. Neal, 13 W. Va. 374.

But where the contract made between the parties compels the vendor to convey the land with covenant of general warranty, and to put the party in possession of the land, a court of equity will protect the vendee against a defect of title to any part of the land included in the contract, although that defect was known to the purchaser, when the contract was made, unless there has been a waiver by the purchaser of such objection to the title. Jackson v. Ligon, 8 Leigh 161. The parties must be bound by the contract they made, if it was free from fraud and mistake. Johnston v. Jarrett, 14 W. Va. 238.

IV. RECOVERY BY THE PURCHASER.

Where Vendee is Evicted.—Where land is sold with warranty, and the vendee is evicted, he ought to recover of the vendor, not the value of the land at the time of eviction, but the purchase money, with interest and costs. Lowther v. Commonwealth, 1 Hen. & M. 202; Click v. Green, 77 Va. 835; Threlkeld v. Fitzhugh, 2 Leigh 451; Roller v. Emfinger, 88 Va. 645, 14 S. E. Rep. 337; Abernathy v. Phillips, 82 Va. 769; Emfinger v. Hall, 81 Ga. 94; Stout v. Jackson, 2 Rand. 132.

Though a sale of land be made with covenant of general warranty, yet the purchaser cannot claim against the vendor for costs expended by the purchaser in defense of a suit by an adverse claimant of the land, which suit resulted in favor of the purchaser, and the title which he acquired by his purchase. Smith v. Parsons, 33 W. Va. 644, 11 S. E. Rep. 68. See Threlkeld v. Fitzhugh, 2 Leigh 451.

And if land be sold according to certain metes and bounds, and by a covenant under seal, the vendor agrees to warrant the title against all persons whatsoever; he is bound to include, in a conveyance with general warranty, and in case of eviction, to make compensation for all the lands within those bounds, which he held and claimed as his own at the time of the sale, and showed to the purchaser as part of the lands sold; notwithstanding his title thereto was defective. But he is not bound to convey lands which were not held and claimed by him at the time of the sale, nor shown as part of the lands sold; although his title papers may comprehend them. Beverley v. Lawson, 3 Munf. 317.

Vendee Cannot Recover from Assignee.—The vendee of land having paid a part of the purchase money to the assignee of his bond for the same, it turns out that the quantity of the land is deficient, and that the money already paid to the assignee is more than the vendee was bound to pay. Held, he has no equity to recover back the excess from the assignee. Crawford v. McDaniel, 1 Rob. 448.

Agreement to Refund on Eviction.—Where a vendor sells the land of his wife without a conveyance, and part of price is paid with the understanding expressed in the receipt for the sum paid, that if a third person's heirs (who were likewise the heirs of the wife), got a redivision of their ancestor's lands (whereof the land sold is part), the vendor is to pay the vendee his money back and wife dies intestate without having had issue, and the heirs get the land from the vendee by legal proceedings, the latter is entitled to have his money, so paid upon a consideration that failed, refunded by the vendor. Ferguson v. Teel, 83 Va. 690.

On Breach of Executory Contract.—The measure of damages on breach of contract for the sale and conveyance of real estate is the contract price, and not the difference between the contract price and the market value of the property at the time of the breach; and the vendor can only recover the purchase money actually paid and interest thereon. Stuart v. Pennis, 100 Va. 612, 43 S. E. Rep. 667; Thompson v. Guthrie, 9 Leigh 101.

Where Lands of Public Debtor Sold by Commonwealth.—When the commonwealth sells the lands of a public debtor, and the purchaser is afterwards evicted by title paramount, the purchaser has no redress against the commonwealth; as the law authorizes a sale of all the estate and interest of the debtor. The rule caveat emptor applies in such case. Commonwealth v. McClanahan, 4 Rand. 482.

Where Vendee Buys Up Better Title.—If a vendee buys up a better title than that of his vendor, and the vendor was guilty of no fraud, he can only be compelled to refund to the vendee the amount of money paid for the better title. Roller v. Effinger, 88 Va. 645, 14 S. E. Rep. 337.

And where a vendor conveys with covenants of general warranty, and adverse titles are set up which the vendor buys in, it is no objection that the conveyances for such bought in titles are made to the vendor, in a suit by the vendee claiming an abatement of purchase money for defective titles. Thompson v. Edwards, 3 W. Va. 660.

Recovery for Improvements.—To entitle a party in equity to an allowance for improvements, he must have been a bona fide possessor under a defective title, supposed by him to be good. Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 102; Dawson v. Grow, 29 W. Va. 333, 1 S. E. Rep. 564.

Or the vendor must have been guilty of a fraud by permitting such improvements, without giving notice to the possessor, or of gross laches in asserting his claim after he was apprized of it. Morris v. Terrell, 2 Rand. 6.

But the compensation must not exceed the amount due for rents and profits. Irick v. Fulton, 3 Gratt. 198.

Cannot Recover under a Mistake of Law.—One having notice of facts rendering his title inferior to that of another, who by mistake of law regards his title as good, cannot claim for permanent improvements. Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. Rep. 411.

Effect of Notice on Recovery.—Persons who occupy lands under defective titles and make thereon permanent and beneficial improvements with notice, actual or constructive, of the infirmity of their titles, cannot, upon the recovery of the lands by the rightful owners, obtain compensation for improvements. Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 147; Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 95.

And under our statute, (ch. 91, Amend. Code of W. Va.), a claimant, who has been evicted from land by the true owner, is not entitled to compensation for permanent improvements placed by him upon the land, when it is shown that both the owner and such claimant derive title from the same grantor, and that, at the time of the conveyance to the claimant, the deed of the owner had been duly recorded in the proper county, although the claimant may not have had any actual notice of the better title, unless the owner had been guilty of fraud or laches in not notifying such claimant to desist, when he knew the improvements were being made by the claimant under a mistaken belief that his title was good. Dawson v. Grow, 29 W. Va. 333, 1 S. E. Rep. 564.

Where Vendee Surrenders Property without Reservation He Cannot Recover.—When a purchaser of real property makes permanent improvements thereon attached to the freehold, and then being unable to pay for it surrenders the property to the vendor, without express reservation of the improvements and cancels the contract of purchase, the improvements go with the property back to the vendor. Patton v. Moore, 16 W. Va. 428.

Vendee Not Chargeable with Rent or Improvements, Made or Land Cleared by Him.—Where the court of chancery is adjusting the mutual rights between the occupier of land, who has made improvements under the belief that he had a just claim, and the real owner of the land, it will adopt the rule which the Code prescribes in actions of ejectment, and will estimate against the occupant the annual value of such part of the premises, if any, as was improved and in a state fit and prepared for cultivation at the time he took possession thereof, and will credit him with the value of all improvements made thereon; but will not charge him for the use of any improvements made upon the land by him, or for the use of any part of the land cleared by him. Fishack v. Ball, 84 W. Va. 644, 12 S. E. Rep. 866.

V. SALE IN GROSS OR BY ACRE.

The law on this subject is so well settled, it will suffice to refer to the foot-notes in which the cases are collected and the subject fully treated. See foot-note to Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 698; Caldwell v. Craig, 21 Gratt. 132; Crawford v. McDaniel, 1 Rob. 448; Blessing v. Beatty, 1 Rob. 287; Keyton v. Brawford, 5 Leigh 39; Quesnel v. Woodlief, 6 Call 218; Pendleton v. Stewart, 5 Call 1; Jolliffe v. Hite, 1 Call 301.

A. PURCHASER ENTITLED TO ABATEMENT OF PRICE.—It is well settled that if a deficiency in quantity is found to exist where the contract is a sale by the acre, the purchaser will be entitled to an abatement for the value of the deficiency, and that a court of equity will, even after a conveyance is executed, abate the deficiency from the unpaid purchase money. Thompson v. Catlett, 24 W. Va. 524; Koger v. Kane, 5 Leigh 606; Bartlett v. Bartlett, 37 W. Va. 235, 16 S. E. Rep. 453; Butcher v. Peterson, 26 W. Va. 447; Sergeant v. Linkous, 83 Va. 664, 3 S. E. Rep. 295; Watson v. Hoy, 28 Gratt. 698; Hoback v. Kilgore, 26 Gratt. 442; Nelson v. Matthews, 2 Hen. & M. 164; Bee v. Burdett, 23 W. Va. 744; Prichard v. Evans, 31 W. Va. 137, 5 S. E. Rep. 461; Board v. Wilson, 34 W. Va. 609, 12 S. E. Rep. 778; Grantland v. Wight, 2 Munf. 179; Fleet v. Hawkins, 6 Munf. 188; Humphreys v. McClanahan, 1 Munf. 493.

But a purchaser who buys a tract of land as containing so many acres, more or less, and agrees to take upon himself the risk, as to lines, or quantity, appearing, (also better acquainted with the land than the vendor, against whom there is no proof of fraud,) is not entitled to any relief in equity, for a loss relating to the risk undertaken. Hull v. Cunningham, 1 Munf. 336.

And where a party, by an agreement in writing, contracts to sell a tract of land, describing it by a general local description, and as being the same land conveyed to him by a third party, the vendee has a right to look to the records for a description of the land; and if it there appears that the land is described by metes and bounds, and containing a certain number of acres, such vendor will be regarded as representing the land to contain the number of acres mentioned in said recorded deed. Boggs v. Harper, 45 W. Va. 551, 31 S. E. Rep. 943.

Though land be sold in gross, for so much, be it more or less, yet, if it be evident that both parties were mistaken in a material point, as to the lines by which the vendor held, and there was no express agreement on the part of the purchaser to take the risk upon himself, a court of equity will give relief for a deficiency. But if the purchaser do not (by eviction or otherwise), lose the land he expected to get; but make no entry for it as vacant, and obtain a patent, the measure of relief is only the amount of his expenditure in procuring the patent, with a reasonable allowance for trouble therein, and actual costs of suit. Hull v. Cunningham, 1 Munf. 380.

Principle on Which Abatement Allowed.—The principle upon which equity gives relief in cases of excess and deficiency in the estimated quantity upon the sale of lands, is where there is a mistake; whether the mutual mistake of the parties, or the mistake of one of them, occasioned by the fraud or culpable negligence of the other. Nichols v. Cooper, 2 W. Va. 347.

One Tract Not Liable for Deficiency of Another.—Land in the hands of a purchaser is not liable for a deficiency of quantity in another tract of land, for the title of which the mortgage is collateral security; there having been no stipulation, known to the purchaser, that the mortgaged premises should be liable for such deficiency. Davison v. Waite, 2 Munf. 527.

In Case of Excess Vendee Is Liable.—Whenever it does not clearly appear that land was sold by the tract, and not by the acre, the vendee ought to be responsible for the value of the surplus land found in the tract and if no circumstances appear to give a different rule, such value is to be estimated by the average value, per acre, of the whole purchase. Hundley v. Lyons, 5 Munf. 342.

Deficiency to Be Valued as at Time of Contract.—Where land is sold with warranty, and there is a deficiency in the quantity, the purchaser is entitled to compensation for the value of such deficiency, not at the time when it is discovered, but at the time of the contract. Nelson v. Matthews, 2 Hen. & M. 164.

Nature of the Demand.—A claim for compensation for deficiency in quantity of land conveyed by deed, where the purchase money has been paid, is a mere personal demand, not cognizable only in equity, but at law, and is subject to the statute of limitations. Burbridge v. Sadler, 46 W. Va. 39, 32 S. E. Rep. 1028.

Rule for Estimating Value of Deficiency.—In a case of mere deficiency in the quantity, the general rule of the compensation is according to the average value of the whole tract, but there may be particular circumstances requiring a departure from the rule, and it must be in conformity to the facts of the case. Nichols v. Cooper, 2 W. Va. 347.

Abatement for Reservation of Timber Privileges.—A reservation of timber privileges by a vendor, who covenants with general warranty, to his vendor, can be estimated in value and the amount abated from the purchase money due from the vendee. Thompson v. Edwards, 3 W. Va. 660.

Failure of Third Party to Pay No Ground for Abatement of Contract.—Where by consent of the vendor, the vendee sold a portion of land to a third party with the understanding that, if he paid for it to the original vendor at the price he sold it for, the deed should be made to him, and he fails to perform the contract, no abatement should be allowed on this ground. McCoy v. Bassett, 26 W. Va. 571.

Portion of Land Held by Adverse Claimant.—Where there is a sale of land under an executory agreement, providing for a conveyance with general warranty, and a portion of the land is at the time of the sale in the actual possession of an adverse claimant, and the purchaser buys the land held by the adverse claimant, and the vendor seeks to collect the purchase money from the purchaser, and the purchaser asks an abatement for the land held by the adverse claimant, and it does not appear whether the title of the adverse claimant is paramount or not, it is error to decree the purchase money against the purchaser and the land without allowing any abatement. As doubt is cast upon the title by such possession of the adverse claimant, before decreeing there should be an inquiry by a commissioner to ascertain the character of the title of such adverse claimant. Smith v. Parsons, 33 W. Va. 644, 11 S. E. Rep. 68.

VI. WHEN PURCHASER ENTITLED TO RIGHT OF WAY.

The vendor granted land having no access save by private way over other land of his. This way was not named in the deed, but he told the vendee the law gave him that way as incident to grant. Later the vendor granted a tract lying beyond first vendee's land, granting the right of way over the same private way, which was used by both vendees. Subsequently vendor's lands were sold under decree, and purchaser received a deed granting the same right of way. Held, this purchaser cannot close this way against first vendee. Bond v. Willis, 84 Va. 796, 6 S. E. Rep. 136.

Presumption of Dedication.—Where, at the time of the purchase of real estate, there is a road or right of way, used by the public, such as a public highway, or a road used so long that there may be a presumption of a dedication to the public, the purchaser takes this land subject to such right; and he is not protected even by a deed of warranty against the incumbrances. Jordan v. Eve, 31 Gratt. 1; Deacons v. Doyle, 75 Va. 258.

Highway Not Embraced in Covenants against Encumbrances.—Where the vendor sells to a purchaser, and conveys with a covenant against incumbrances, it was held that a public highway through the land was not such an incumbrance as was intended by the instrument. Jordan v. Eve, 31 Gratt. 1.

VII. RIGHTS, DUTIES AND LIABILITIES OF PARTIES.

A. IN GENERAL.

Liable for Interest on Unpaid Purchase Money.—A vendee of land let into possession, and the purchase money remaining unpaid, shall pay interest thereon, though the vendor be in default, unless he has not only kept the purchase money idle, but given the vendor notice that he has so kept it. Brockenbrough v. Blythe, 3 Leigh 619.

Vendee in Possession Liable for Taxes.—Land is sold by executory contract in 1848, and conveyed absolutely in February, 1860; the vendee executing an obligation to pay a debt due for purchase money on the land from the vendor, and to sell the land and pay the vendor "one-third of the proceeds of the land when realized from any sale or sales thereof." The lands are not sold for thirty-four years. No part of the taxes paid by the vendee are chargeable to the vendor. Caperton v. Caperton, 26 W. Va. 479, 15 S. E. Rep. 267.

Not Duty of Purchaser to Prepare Deed.—A purchaser is not bound to prepare and tender a deed to the vendor, unless such an obligation can be inferred from the terms of the contract. Fairfax v. Lewis, 2 Rand. 20.

Purchaser May Have Unpaid Purchase Money Applied to Encumbrances.—Where a person buys land and obtains from his vendor a deed therefor with covenants of general warranty, and the land at the time it was so purchased and conveyed, was encumbered with a deed of trust executed by his vendor, the purchaser has the right to have the unpaid purchase money remaining in his hands applied in discharge of the trust debt. Douglass v. Rutherford, 25 W. Va. 708.

Where Purchase is Joint Each Entitled to Equal Share.—Where there is a joint purchase of land by two, to whom it is conveyed, and who give their joint and several bond for the purchase money they are entitled to equal proportions in the absence of any agreement to the contrary. Jarrett v. Johnson, 11 Gratt. 327.

Land Bought at Tax Sale by One Cotenant Held in Trust for Other.—Where a cotenant permits the common property to be sold for taxes, and directly or indirectly secures the title in his own name, his deed will be avoided at the instance of his cotenants, or he will be held to be a trustee holding the legal title for their mutual benefit. Parker v. Brast, 45 W. Va. 399, 32 S. E. Rep. 299.

Where Purchaser Pays Encumbrance Only Entitled to Credit to Amount of Encumbrance.—If the purchaser agree to pay a certain sum, in discharge of an encumbrance, for which he is to have a credit in part of the purchase money; and it does not appear that the vendor deceived him with respect to the sum for which the removal of such encumbrance could be obtained, he is not to be credited for any larger sum than the encumbrances may compel him to pay. Mayo v. Purcell, 8 Munf. 243.

Purchaser Chargeable with Rents and Profits.—Pendente lite purchasers occupying the estate, when the record charges their grantor with fraud in fact in the acquisition of the property, are chargeable with rents and profits. Stout v. Mfg. Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 572.

When Purchaser Becomes Personally Liable.—A purchaser who has notice of the rights of another in a tract of land, and sells it to a third person without giving notice thereof to him, so as to place the subject in controversy beyond the reach of the right owners, becomes personally liable for the demand. Tompkins v. Powell, 6 Leigh 576.

Where Purchaser Liable to Pay Purchase Money Twice.—Where receiver collects the money from a purchaser at a judicial sale before giving the required bond, and fails to account, though he may afterwards give the bond, the purchaser may be compelled to pay the money a second time. Woods v. Ellis, 85 Va. 471, 7 S. E. Rep. 852.

Vendor Compelled to Receive Confederate Money.—Where a vendor filed a bill to enforce his lien and the defendant answered that it was intended by both parties that the purchase price was to be paid in confederate money, it was held that the vendor was compelled to accept it, there being nothing in the bonds reserving the title, indicating a contrary intention. Harrison v. Farmer's Bank of Va., 4 W. Va. 393.

Vendor Entitled to Exoneration at Expense of Land.—When it is expressly or impliedly agreed that an incumbrance shall be deducted from the consideration, or paid by the purchaser, the vendor stands in the position of a surety, and is entitled to exoneration at the expense of the land. Curry v. Hale, 15 W. Va. 397.

So where B. purchases a tract of land of W. and takes a general warranty deed, and afterwards ascertains that judgments in favor of divers persons have been recovered and docketed against W., and to save his land from being sold to satisfy said judgment liens, B. pays off the judgments, he is entitled to be subrogated to the liens of such judgment creditors against any other land owned by W. Beall v. Walker, 26 W. Va. 742.

And where a vendor and vendee enter into a written contract for the sale of a tract of land at a stipulated price, which the vendee agrees to pay in future instalments, but fails to make the payments, or any of them, and then assigns the benefit of his contract or purchase to a third party, who takes possession of the land under the assignment, the third party, in the absence of a valid and binding agreement to pay the same, is not personally liable to the vendor for the unpaid purchase money due upon the land from his vendee. Fisher v. Brown, 24 W. Va. 713.

Purchaser Liable for Support in Planter Agreed.—When a father and mother enter into a contract with their son, whereby they sell to the son a small farm, and, as part of the consideration therefor, the son agrees to comfortably support his parents during their lives; and the contract stipulates that it is expressly understood by all parties that the parents are to reside on the farm, and occupy a portion of the dwelling house, and the son another portion of the house and that the son is to keep his parents in eating at his table the same as he has for himself. Held, that the son is bound to comfortably support his parents at the dwelling house on the farm, and not elsewhere. Korne v. Korne, 30 W. Va. 1, 8 S. E. Rep. 17.

Right of Survey.—Where there is a sale of land by the acre, a right of survey exists whether expressly reserved or not; and if no time is limited for making the survey, it may be made at any time before the whole business is closed between the parties. McCoy v. Bassett, 26 W. Va. 570.

Purchaser May Retain Enough Purchase Money to Indemnify Him against Dower.—Where a vendor sells a tract of land to his vendee, and executes to the vendee a deed, in which his wife joins, but the certificate of acknowledgment is so defective in form as not to release the contingent dower of the wife, part of the purchase money having been paid in cash, and time having been given for the residue, specific performance of the contract will not be enforced by compelling the payment of the residue of the purchase money, unless the defendant is allowed to retain a sufficient amount of such purchase money to adequately indemnify him against such contingent right of dower. Thorn v. Sprouse, 39 W. Va. 706, 20 S. E. Rep. 676.

When Purchaser Becomes Personally Liable for Purchase Money.—Where a debtor sells and conveys his land to a purchaser who assumes the payment of certain debts of the vendor in consideration of the conveyance, the purchaser becomes personally responsible for the payment of the debts, and, as between him and his vendor, is primarily liable. Moore v. Triplett, 96 Va. 603, 32 S. E. Rep. 50.

And an agreement between a vendee and a second purchaser, that he shall pay the debt of the vendee to the vendor for the land, must be understood as subject to the same limitations and exceptions, as if the contract had been to pay the money to the vendee himself. Bumgardner v. Allen, 6 Munf. 439.

Duty of Purchaser to See to the Application of Purchase Money.—Where a charge upon land by a will for the payment of debts is general, a purchaser from the personal representative is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money. Meek v. Thompson, 8 Gratt. 184.

And a purchaser from a trustee who is invested with a power of sale for the purpose of reinvestment is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money except where the sale amounts to a breach of trust on the part of the trustee, and the purchaser has notice of the breach, either from the face of the transaction itself, or otherwise. If he has such notice as makes him a party or privy to the trustee's misconduct, the property will be affected in his hands with the trusts which previously attached to it, otherwise not. Redford v. Clarke, 100 Va. 115, 40 S. E. Rep. 630.

B. DUTY OF VENDOR TO MAKE CONVEYANCE.—A purchaser entitled to good title need not pay purchase money until he gets good title. Watson v. Coast, 35 W. Va. 463, 14 S. E. Rep. 249; Clark v. Gordon, 35 W. Va. 735, 14 S. E. Rep. 255.

And it is error to decree payment of purchase money before the time fixed in the contract. Dunfee v. Childs, 45 W. Va. 155, 30 S. E. Rep. 102.

But where a deed has been accepted, the purchaser cannot refuse to pay purchase money, unless his grantor is insolvent, or the title is proven to be bad, or a suit endangering it is actually pending or threatened, and in the last case the grounds of suit must be given, and they must be such as ought to cause a reasonable man to fear loss of his land. McClagherty v. Croft, 43 W. Va. 272, 27 S. E. Rep. 246; Jackson v. Welsh, 51 W. Va. 482, 41 S. E. Rep. 924.

Administrator Need Not Recite Authority in Deed.—Where a party, describing himself as an administrator, sold and conveyed a tract of land to a purchaser, reserving a vendor's lien upon the face of the deed to secure a portion of the purchase money, it is not necessary to the validity of the deed that he should recite his power and authority to sell said land on the face of the deed, but it is regarded as the better practice to do so. Bartlett v. Bartlett, 34 W. Va. 33, 11 S. E. Rep. 732.

Purchaser May Abandon Contract.—If a vendor fails to make good a general warranty deed, free from all incumbrances, at the fixed time agreed upon for the consummation of the sale, because of incumbrances, the vendees have the right to abandon their purchase and cancel their contract; and, if the vendor refuses to place them in statu quo, they may apply to a court of equity for relief. Parsons v. Smith, 46 W. Va. 728, 34 S. E. Rep. 922.

And if the terms of the agreement be, that the vendor binds himself to make the conveyance, and the vendee binds himself and his heirs to make payment, etc., on the day of the execution of the conveyance, and no conveyance be made or tendered by the vendor in his lifetime, the vendee is not bound to accept a conveyance from his heirs, but may waive the contract altogether. Spindle v. Miller, 6 Munf. 170.

When Impossible the Deed Need Not Be Made until Money is Payable.—When it is not in the vendor's power to make a deed before the purchase money is due then it is not a breach of contract in failing to make and tender a deed to the vendee before the money is payable. Snodgrass v. Wolf, 11 W. Va. 158.

Deed Fraudulently Obtained Not Available for Specific Execution.—When a contract in writing, for land, is delivered to a third party as an escrow, not to be delivered by the holder as a contract, but upon the order of the vendor, which is fraudulently obtained from the holder by the vendee upon false pretenses and withheld when demanded, he cannot make it available for the purposes of a specific execution. Booth v. Hartley, 3 W. Va. 478.

Definite Time Fixed for Payment of Money and None for Making Deed, Does Not Constitute Latter a Condition Precedent to Former.—Where there is a definite time stated for the payment of the purchase price and none fixed for making the deed the latter is not a condition precedent to the former. Clarke v. Curtis, 11 Leigh 559.

And in a suit upon a bond, executed as part of the purchase money for a tract of land, brought by the vendor, which contains the following condition: "This payment is to be made on condition that the title be made good for the interest the heirs of W. L. hold in said land."—a compliance with the condition must precede the collection of the amount of the bond from the vendee. Hoke v. Jones, 33 W. Va. 501, 10 S. E. Rep. 775.

Dividing Land into Several Tracts.—Where the land sold is to be laid off in one, two or three tracts, as the vendee may choose, the vendors are not in default for failing to convey until the vendee has made his election, and has caused the land to be surveyed. Purcell v. McCleary, 10 Gratt. 246.

Grantees' Satisfaction with Title Not Necessary.—A vendor covenants that on payment of first installment of price he will make title in fee to, and, by such conveyances as the grantees, or their counsel, may reasonably require, convey and release such land in possession to the grantees, free from incumbrances or demands. Hild vendor is required by his covenant to convey the land to vendees by deed with proper covenants of title, but the grantees' satisfaction with the title is not necessary as a condition precedent to make the acceptance of the deed obligatory on them. Gish v. Moomaw, 89 Va. 376, 17 S. E. Rep. 324.

When by Agreement the Money is to Be Paid and Deeds Delivered on Same Day Makes Delivery a Condition Precedent.—An agreement for the sale of land being, that the vendor shall make and execute deeds of conveyance, and the vendee shall pay, on the day of the execution of the deeds, part of the purchase money, and give bonds for the balance, as soon as the quantity, (supposed to be a certain number of acres,) can be ascertained by an accurate survey, the vendee is not bound to make the payment, nor give bonds for the balance, until the vendor shall first have made or tendered the conveyance; not, withstanding a survey ascertaining the quantity of the land has been made. Spindle v. Miller, 6 Munf. 170.

M. dies in November 1861, and by his will directs certain land to be sold. It is valued in December by commissioners at eight dollars per acre; and the administrator c. t. a. sells it within sixty days at a private sale, the greater part at ten dollars, and the rest at eight, and the purchaser pays the purchase money, some of it before it is due, and takes the receipts of the administrator for the payments; but the land is not conveyed to him. The parties act in good faith in the transaction. The sale is valid, and the purchaser is entitled to a conveyance of the land, without any conditions to be imposed upon him. Moss v. Moorman, 24 Gratt. 97.

VIII. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

A. VENDOR'S REMEDIES.

1. ACTION OF EJECTMENT.—The action of ejectment is the proper remedy to recover real estate which has been granted by a deed containing a condition subsequent, upon a failure to perform which, the estate is to determine, and at common law it was necessary for a grantor to re-enter upon the estate in order to work a forfeiture, but the necessity for re-entry has been abolished by § 16, ch. 93, Code (1891, p. 709). Martin v. Ohio R. Co., 37 W. Va. 349, 16 S. E. Rep. 589.

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Vendor Must Show Willingness to Perform Contract.—A bill for the specific performance of a contract may be resorted to in order to compel the payment of the purchase money, but the plaintiff must show ability and willingness to perform his part of the agreement. Wood v. Walker, 92 Va. 24, 22 S. E. Rep. 533.

B. PURCHASER'S REMEDY.

1. ACTION AT LAW.—Where a purchaser buys real estate the title to which proves bad he may sue for damages, or may abandon the premises, and when sued for the purchase money set up a defense the want of title, or if he has paid the price may sue to recover it. Newberry v. Ruffin, 102 Va. 73, 45 S. E. Rep. 733.

But where land is conveyed in consideration of a maintenance bond for the support of the grantors, by which the grantees bind themselves to support the grantors in their families on the land conveyed, no right of action accrues to the grantors, either against the grantees or the land, if any exists, until the grantees fail to perform their covenant and undertaking, as set forth and stipulated in their bond. Crim v. Holsberry, 42 W. Va. 667, 23 S. E. Rep. 314.

A vendee of real estate under an unwritten contract who has not paid any part of the purchase money, nor been let into possession, and who has refused to complete the purchase because the vendor has declined to make such a deed as the contract called for, has a full, adequate and complete defense at law to an action against him to recover the purchase money, and will not be entertained in a court of equity to enjoin the prosecution of such an action by the vendor. Virginia Min. Co. v. Wilkinson, 92 Va. 98, 23 S. E. Rep. 889.

Suit in Equity Not to Be Changed Into Action of Trespass.—The complainants are seeking by a suit in equity to set off against the unpaid balance of purchase money the unliquidated damages they have sustained by reason of the trespass or trespasses, which cannot be done. Their remedy, if they have been injured as they claim, is at law. A suit in equity cannot be changed into an action of trespass. Nor would the fact of the insolvency of the vendor give jurisdiction to a court of equity to enter such a decree as is prayed for, even if the injury complained of had been caused by the acts of the vendor himself. Cleaver v. Matthews, 83 Va. 804, 8 S. E. Rep. 439; Robertson v. Hogsheads, 3 Leigh 667; Buzard v. Houston, 119 U. S. 347.

B. agreed to convey to H. and N. certain land, they to give for half the price three bonds, with sureties. J. and three others promised to become the sureties, provided the vendees secured them by a trust deed. The bonds were executed and left with a third party until the conveyance and trust deed were given. B. gave possession to vendees but no conveyance, and they gave no trust deed. The bonds remained with third party. H. acquired the rights of his covenantee, and died indebted. B. filed a bill against N. and J. his associates, calling on the latter to answer whether the bonds had been delivered, and on N. whether he was willing to complete the purchase, and if not, then B. asked for a rescission. Defendants answered, denying the delivery, and took depositions sustaining the denial. B. filed amended bill, alleging that the allegations in the original bill were mistaken. He then brought an action at law on the bonds which was enjoined. Held, B. could not maintain the action at law, and much less both that action and the suit in equity. Jones v. Bond, 86 Va. 81, 9 S. E. Rep. 503.

Action of Assumpsit.—Where a contract of sale of real estate is not by deed, and no conveyance has been made, a vendee can recover back in action of assumpsit what he has paid on the contract, when the conditions have failed, or the contract has been rescinded, or the vendor refuses to comply with his part of the contract. Bier v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 830.

Before Title Passes Action Is on Contract.—Before the legal title passes from the vendor on a contract for the sale of land there is no lien and the vendor's remedy in such a case is on the contract, nor can the vendee compel a relinquishment of the title until he clothes himself with equity by the payment of the purchase money. Yancey v. Mauck, 15 Gratt. 300.

What Vendor Must Show to Maintain Action.—In 2 Minor's Institutes (4th Ed.) at page 864, it is said:

"The purchaser can maintain no action at law, any more than the vendor, unless he can show that he has performed on his side every condition precedent stipulated for in the contract, and it will be remembered that in the case of mutual and dependent covenants they are looked upon as respectively conditions precedent so that, if the title is to be conveyed, and the purchase money paid at the same time, as the vendor cannot, on his side, as we have seen, recover the purchase money without showing that he was at that time able and offered to convey a good title, so the purchaser cannot recover unless on his side he is able to show a payment or tender of the purchase money at that time (unless he has been discharged from so doing by the vendor), and also a demand duly made of a conveyance, with an allowance of a sufficient time afterwards to prepare it. Newberry v. Ruffin, 103 Va. 73, 45 S. E. Rep. 734.

2. SUIT IN EQUITY.—A claim for a deficiency in the quantity of land sold, gives jurisdiction to a court of equity. Castleman v. Veitch, 3 Rand. 598.

And the fact that the plaintiff has adequate remedy at law, does not oust a court of equity of its jurisdiction, where relief is sought on the ground that the vendor fraudulently misrepresented the quantity of land sold. Meek v. Spracher, 87 Va. 162, 12 S. E. Rep. 397.

But, where a lot is sold which afterwards depreciates in value, and there is no misrepresentation or fraud on the part of the vendor, the vendee cannot enjoin the collection of the purchase money. Price v. Ayres, 10 Gratt. 575.

A purchaser, having taken possession of the estate, is not entitled to relief in equity, against a judgment for the purchase money, on the ground, that the title of the vendor is not clearly shewn to be good; but is bound on his part, to prove it bad. Grantland v. Wight, 5 Munf. 295.

C. PARTIES.

Previous Agreement to Convey.—In a suit in chancery to recover a tract of land against a vendee on the ground that he had previously agreed to convey the same land, in a certain event, to the plaintiff it seems, that the vendor or his legal representative, ought to be parties. Lewis v. Madisons, 1 Munf. 303.

And where necessary parties are not before the court, the statute does not protect the purchasers' title, but it falls with the reversal. Turk v. Skiles, 38 W. Va. 404, 18 S. E. Rep. 561; Dunfee v. Childs, 45 W. Va. 155, 30 S. E. Rep. 102.

Suit against Subsequent Purchaser.—The vendee, or his legal representatives, ought to be parties to a suit in chancery brought by the vendor against a subsequent purchaser, to recover a balance alleged to be due from the vendee. Duval v. Bibb, 4 Hen. & M. 113.

And where a vendor files his bill to subject land for the payment of the purchase money, and the vendee answers and says that several portions of the land are held by others, naming them, by title paramount, and shows, in his answer, that the grounds on which such third persons claim portions of the land are such as will put a reasonable man in just apprehension of losing his land, the plaintiff, if he does not concede this, must amend his bill, and set out specifically all the facts within his knowledge with reference to the claim of the third parties; and if he insists that his own title is good, and the land is his, then he must make the third parties whose claims he disputes defendants to the bill, so that a proper decree may be entered, protecting the rights of all parties interested. Heavner v. Morgan, 30 W. Va. 335, 4 S. E. Rep. 406.

Vendee Purchasing Land in His Own Right and That of Others.—Where a vendee purchased land for himself and as trustee for others whose interest appears on the face of the title bond executed by the vendor, for the conveyance of the legal title, such beneficiaries were necessary parties to any suit instituted for the sale of the land to satisfy unpaid purchase money, and if not parties they are not bound by the decree. Grinnan v. Edwards, 21 W. Va. 347.

Suit for Abatement of Price—Persons Not Named in Contract.—So where a vendee sues for an abatement of the purchase price for deficiency in quantity of land, a person, not named in the contract, but known to vendee to have given his bond for a part of the purchase money, and to be entitled to part of the land, is a proper party defendant. Meek v. Spracher, 87 Va. 162, 12 S. E. Rep. 397.

Vendee May Maintain Action in His Own Name Though Others Entitled to Share in Recovery.—Under a written contract between the defendants and plaintiffs for the sale of lands, the latter paid part of the price upon condition the money be refunded if the title, upon examination, proved unsatisfactory. Others, including one defendant, shared the purchase with plaintiff. The title proving unsatisfactory to the plaintiff upon examination, he required the sum paid to be refunded. The defendants claimed a reasonable time to make good the title. Held, plaintiff was entitled to abandon the purchase upon the title proving unsatisfactory, and to maintain, in his own name, an action for the sum paid, though others might be entitled to share the money with him. Averett v. Lipscombe, 76 Va. 404; Watts v. Holland, 86 Va. 999, 11 S. E. Rep. 1015.

D. THE BILL.

Must Allege Tender or Performance.—It may be said that the vendee in his action at law against the vendor for failure to perform his contract must make his part of the contract a condition precedent, as well as must the vendor in his action against the vendee for failure to perform his part of the contract, and each must aver performance of his part of the contract, or tender of performance. Barrett v. McAllister, 38 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. Rep. 224.

And where the answer in a suit alleges defect in title to property received in exchange for land sold, but does not allege that his possession has been disturbed, or file a cross bill, he cannot complain if exceptions to that part of answer is sustained, especially when final decree is without prejudice to his right to sue for such defect. Meek v. Spracher, 87 Va. 162, 12 S. E. Rep. 397.

Must Allege Fraud or Mistakes.—Where parties have made a settlement in regard to a transaction, and struck a balance, which has been adjusted by cash or note, it is incumbent on the party complaining of fraud or mistake, by suit in equity, to allege it especially in his bill, and establish it by proof. Currey v. Lawler, 29 W. Va. 111, 11 S. E. Rep. 897.

Grounds on Which Suit is Based to Be Alleged.—By the words "if the title is questioned by a suit either prosecuted or threatened," is not meant that it is sufficient to allege in the bill that a "suit is threatened" merely, but the bill on its face must allege the grounds upon which the "threatened suit" is based, and which must be such as will put a reasonable man in just apprehension of the loss of his land. Kinports v. Rawson, 29 W. Va. 487, 2 S. E. Rep. 85.

Sufficiency of Allegations.—In an action upon a written agreement for the sale of a tract of land, setting forth that the vendor agreed to give vendee possession, and a conveyance free of incumbrances, on or before a certain day, for which the vendee agreed to pay to the vendor part of the purchase money on the same day, and to give him for the balance a deed of trust, or such other security as he might require; and that the conveyance was not to be executed until the first payment was made and security given; the declaration, in behalf of the vendor, sufficiently charged a breach, by stating that the plaintiff was, on that day, in lawful and peaceable possession of the land, and ready to give the defendant possession, with a proper conveyance, clear of all encumbrances; but that the defendant failed to make the payment and give the security. Moss v. Stipp, 3 Munf. 159.

When Deed Required to Be Filed.—Upon a bill filed for the payment of the purchase price of land, on a contract which provides that the vendee shall make a deed when price is paid, the court should when entering a decree of sale require the vendee to file such deed as is provided for in the contract. Hempfield R. Co. v. Thornburg, 1 W. Va. 361.

E. PLEA.

Plea of Failure of Consideration Not Permitted.—In an action on a bond given for the purchase money of land, the act of 1831 does not authorize a plea of failure of consideration upon equitable grounds which would require a rescission of the contract out of which the bond originated, and a reinvestment of the obligee with the interest in the land alleged to have been sold to the obligor. Shiffett v. Humane Society, 7 Gratt. 297.

F. ANSWER.

Amendment of.—If the proofs show that the plaintiff has a cause which entitles him to relief, that it is of a similar nature to that alleged in his bill, and such as might be made available by proper amendment of his bill, the court on the hearing should not dismiss the bill without giving him an opportunity to amend it within a reasonable time. Doonan v. Glynn, 26 W. Va. 235.

G. DECREE.

Decree Not to Be Personal.—If in a suit against a vendee and assignee, the proceeds of the sale of the land prove sufficient to satisfy the whole of the purchase money remaining unpaid, and the plaintiff afterwards obtains a personal decree against the assignee for the amount of other instalments of the purchase money, which have become due since the institution of his suit, such personal decree is erroneous and will be reversed. Fisher v. Brown, 24 W. Va. 714.

And in a suit to charge land in the hands of a fraudulent purchaser with money, he yet holding the land, that must be subjected; and there cannot be a personal decree against him for the money, though there may be for costs, if the land does not pay the money and costs. If he has sold, he may be charged with the proceeds. Harris v. Elliott, 45 W. Va. 245, 32 S. E. Rep. 176.

IX. EVIDENCE.

Must Prove Actual Eviction or Superior Title.—Where a purchaser comes into a court of equity for relief against a judgment at law, on the ground of a defect in the vendor's title to part of the tract of land purchased, it is not enough for him to allege such defect or want of title; he must prove an actual eviction, or superior title in some other person. Yancey v. Lewis, 4 Hen. & M. 390.

Parol Evidence.—The burden of proof that the proposal has been accepted, and that notice thereof within the time limited has been communicated to the proposer, rests upon the party claiming to have accepted the same. Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 S. E. Rep. 743.

And in suit by vendors of land sold at public auction, against a purchaser to compel him to comply with the contract, parol evidence is admissible to prove that the written memorandum of contract signed by the auctioneer, does not contain the stipulation relied on as a condition. Averett v. Lipscombe, 76 Va. 404.

Evidence Must Be Clear to Sustain Parol Contract.—The evidence must be clear, full and free from suspicion to enable a court of equity to enforce an oral contract for the sale of land. Harris v. Elliott, 45 W. Va. 245, 32 S. E. Rep. 176.

Declaration of Grantor.—It is well settled that the declarations of a grantor, made subsequent to the conveyance, are not admissible to affect the title of his grantee; and certainly if made a year subsequent. Casto v. Fry, 33 W. Va. 449, 10 S. E. Rep. 799.

X. VENDOR'S LIEN.

A. IMPLIED LIEN.

1. NATURE AND ORIGIN.—The implied lien of the vendor, as the law formerly stood, was the mere creation of the equity courts according to some authorities, having its origin in the presumed intention of the parties; according to others, in the idea there is a natural equity that the land shall stand charged with the unpaid purchase money. This implied lien has sometimes been described as a kind of equitable mortgage, inherent in the contract of sale; sometimes as a trust attaching to the estate, the vendee being regarded as a trustee for the unpaid purchase money. But whatever may have been the origin and nature of this implied lien, it was never considered as constituting an interest in the land conveyed, or as conferring upon the vendor anything beyond the mere right to charge the property with the payment of his debt. Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 699; Little v. Brown, 2 Leigh 353.

And prima facie the purchase money is a lien on the land, and the burden is on the vendee to show the contrary, and the death of the vendee does not alter or defeat the lien. Tompkins v. Mitchell, 3 Rand. 428; Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 607.

2. PROPERTY SUBJECT TO LIEN.

Land.—A vendor of land, not having conveyed the same, or taken a security for the purchase money, has a lien upon the land for satisfaction thereof. Cole v. Scott, 2 Wash. 141; Cole v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 290; Williams v. Price, 5 Munf. 507.

But the implied equitable lien of a vendor upon the subject sold, for the purchase money, does not give the vendor asserting the lien, any claim for the profits of the subject. Little v. Brown, 2 Leigh 353.

Equitable Interest.—The vendor of an equitable right or title to land retains an implied lien on it for the consideration, whenever under the same circumstances the vendor of the legal title would hold an equitable lien. The same principle and reason apply to both cases, except that our statutes—§ 1, ch. 75 of Code—qualifies the latter, while it has no effect upon the former. Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 607; Board v. Wilson, 34 W. Va. 609, 12 S. E. Rep. 778.

Right of Way.—Where a right of way is sold to a railroad company, the vendee has a lien on the way for the purchase price. Hempfield R. Co. v. Thornburg, 1 W. Va. 261.

Leasehold Estates.—By chancery practice implied equitable liens existed for the purchase money of the sale of a leasehold estate as well as for a freehold, and they are still good, if reserved on the face of the deed by which they are conveyed. Code, ch. 75, § 1, p. 475. Cole v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 290.

3. LIEN BY IMPLICATION ABOLISHED.—The statute of 1849, ch. 119, § 1, provides that the vendor shall have no lien for unpaid purchase money, unless it be reserved on the face of the deed, thus abolishing the lien by implication of law, and substituting in its place a lien by express contract, but this provision was not intended to impart any new quality to the vendor's lien, but to end the vexatious litigation growing out of the claims for the unpaid purchase money against bona fide purchasers of the legal title. Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 700; Stoner v. Harris, 81 Va. 459; Lough v. Michael, 37 W. Va. 679, 17 S. E. Rep. 181. See also, Virginia Code 1887, § 2474.

4. AGREEMENT TO SUPPORT PAY, ANNUITY DOES NOT CONSTITUTE LIEN.—The law is well settled that an implied equitable lien does not exist in favor of a vendor of real estate to secure the consideration therefor when such consideration is the maintenance and support of the grantors during life. McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. 615; Brawley v. Catron, 8 Leigh 522; Crim v. Holsberry, 42 W. Va. 667, 26 S. E. Rep. 314.

And where a conveyance is in consideration of a covenant by the grantee that his estate shall pay an annuity, the vendor's lien does not attach upon the property. McCandlish v. Keen, 13 Gratt. 615.

But a person conveying real estate may create a lien thereon, and charge the same with his support and maintenance by express words showing his intention to charge the land. McClure v. Cook, 39 W. Va. 579, 20 S. E. Rep. 612; Crim v. Holsberry, 42 W. Va. 667, 26 S. E. Rep. 314.

5. INSTANCES OF LIENS.

Lien on Equitable Title after Acquired Legal Title.

Where land is conveyed by deed of bargain and sale without warranty, in trust to secure a debt by one who has only an equitable, who subsequently obtains the legal title which he sells to D. to whom he conveys it with warranty, it was held that the creditor whose debt was secured by the trust deed only had a lien on the equitable interest. Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 365.

But a court will enforce the payment of the purchase money and the lien thereof against realty, when the vendor at the time of the sale and conveyance thereof, by deed of general warranty, did not have the title thereto, but who afterwards by arrangement and with the assent of his vendee, procured the legal title to be conveyed to the vendee, the vendee at the time of sale and deed being put in actual possession of such realty by the vendor, and never having been evicted of his possession. Schilling v. Short, 15 W. Va. 780.

Lien an Equitable Title.—An implied equitable lien of the vendor of an equitable title or estate, where the contract of sale is unrecorded, will be enforced by a court of equity against the vendee, his heirs, purchasers with notice and his unsecured or general creditors, but not against purchasers for value without notice, nor against mortgage, or trust creditors with or without notice. Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 608.

Lien When Receipt Given for Purchase Money.—A vendor having conveyed a tract of land by an absolute deed of bargain and sale, in which and by receipt at the foot whereof, he acknowledged that the consideration expressed was fully paid, having nevertheless taken the vendee's bonds for the amount thereof and continued to live on the land, by virtue of a parol agreement, that he should retain possession until the contract on the part of the vendee should be fully complied with, retained an equitable lien on the land against a purchaser from the vendee having actual notice of such agreement. Duval v. Bibb, 4 Hen. & M. 113.

Void Contract of Married Woman—Purchaser Entitled to Lien for Money Paid under Lands.—A married woman, for her separate use, purchased from a commissioner of a court a tract of land, the sale whereof was confirmed and the title retained to secure the payment of the purchase money. She and her husband, by written contract with M., agreed that in consideration that he would pay for her the purchase money which she had agreed to pay for the land, she would sell and transfer to him her purchase, and substitute him for herself as purchaser of the land, excepting a specified 20 acres thereof. In compliance with the contract M. was placed in possession of the land sold to him, and he paid for her to the court all her purchase money. Five years afterwards she refused to comply with her contract and reclaimed her land. On a bill filed by M. against S. G. L. and her husband, praying for a specific execution of the contract, and, in case that relief could not be had, then praying that he might be reimbursed the purchase money so paid by him by a sale of the land, it was held (1) that the contract for the sale of her land was not binding upon the married woman. Held further, that the purchase money so paid to the court by M. was an equitable charge upon the land, which a court of equity would enforce for his benefit by a sale of the land, unless otherwise paid. Moore v. Ligon, 30 W. Va. 146, 3 S. E. Rep. 572.

First Vendor May Subject Land after Second Vendee Has Paid Whole Purchase Price to First Vendee.—

Where a vendor, by an executory contract, sold lands on credit, and placed the vendee in possession, and the vendee, without obtaining the legal title from his vendor, or paying all his purchase money, sold and conveyed the land by absolute deed, and collected all the purchase money due from his vendee. Held, that the first vendor might subject the land for sale for the unpaid purchase money due to him, notwithstanding the second vendee has paid all he agreed to pay for the land, and received an absolute deed for it from his vendor. Fisher v. McNulty, 30 W. Va. 186, 3 S. E. Rep. 593; Richards v. Fisher, 8 W. Va. 55.

Money Deposited with Surety Not Secured by Lien—Reservation for Dower.—G. by S. his attorney, sells and conveys land to W.: the conveyance expresses, on its face, that purchase money is all paid; but, in fact, 800 dollars thereof having been paid on day of conveyance, S. on same day, deposits the same in W.'s hands, to indemnify him against a suretyship in certain bonds taken upon no exerts against S. as attorney in fact of G. which no exerts are afterwards discharged; and 400 dollars are, by the contract, retained in W.'s hands to meet the possibility of dower of G.'s wife, and she is now dead; W. sells and conveys the land to R. Held, G. has no lien on the land for the 800 dollars, but has a lien for the 400 dollars with interest. Redford v. Gibson, 12 Leigh 882.

Joint Purchaser Entitled to Lien for Surplus on Paying More than His Share.—A and B are joint purchasers of real property. They give their notes for the payment of the purchase money, and receive a conveyance from the vendor. B becomes insolvent, and A pays more than a moiety of the purchase money. A has a lien on the property to reimburse him all that he has paid above one moiety of the purchase money, in preference of the creditors of B claiming under a deed of trust from B, unless they appear to be purchasers without notice. Tompkins v. Mitchell, 2 Rand. 428.

B. RESERVED LIEN.

1. IN GENERAL.—All vendor's liens for the purchase money of property, unless expressly reserved on the face of the instrument, are abolished by Code 1849, c. 119, § 1. Roanoke Brick & Lime Co. v. Simmons, 2 Va. Dec. 70; Stoner v. Harris, 81 Va. 460. See also, Virginia Code 1887, § 2474.

And a vendor who does not expressly retain a lien for the purchase money in a deed made by him for land has no implied lien thereon on the land, even as against his immediate vendee. Scraggs v. Hill, 43 W. Va. 162, 27 S. E. Rep. 310; Roe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 610.

What Led to Enactment.—The uncertainty in the state of the law, and the perplexing litigation growing out of it, led to the statute passed by our legislature, which provides, that when a conveyance is made, the vendor should not thereby have a lien for the unpaid purchase money, unless such lien is expressly reserved on the face of the conveyance. Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. 186.

Extent of the Lien.—The extent of the lien reserved on the face of a deed does not depend upon the extent of the vendor's interest in the land conveyed, but upon the contract of the parties as gathered from the deed itself, in reserving the lien. Patterson v. Grottoes Co., 93 Va. 578, 25 S. E. Rep. 602.

When Vendor May Insert Clause Reserving Lien.—

A vendor in writing agrees to sell to a vendee a tract of land, for which the vendee is to pay a certain price, a portion of which is to be paid in cash at a future day, and then the vendee is to give his notes for the balance of the purchase money payable on time, and when these notes are given, the vendor is to make to the vendee a deed with covenants of general warranty of title, but nothing is said about a reservation in the deed of the vendor's lien or about any security being given for the deferred payment of the purchase money. Held, when the deed is executed, the vendor has a right to insert in it a clause reserving a vendor's lien for the unpaid purchase money. Findley v. Armstrong, 23 W. Va. 113.

Debt Must Be Described.—A deed for land, retaining a lien for purchase money, must in some way describe the debt, so as to identify it. Literal accuracy is not required. Substantial accuracy, reasonably describing, is sufficient. The description of the charge must be correct as far as it goes, so as to inform creditors and subsequent purchasers what amount is charged on the land, and must be full enough to direct attention to the sources of correct information, and be such a description of the debt as not to mislead or deceive as to its nature and amount. Goff v. Price, 42 W. Va. 384, 26 S. E. Rep. 287.

Vendor May Surrender Bond and Still Retain Lien.—

A vendor of land who retains a lien for the purchase price may surrender to the vendee his bond for such purchase price, and accept the bond of another for the amount, and at the same time retain the benefit of his lien, if the parties plainly so agree. Carper v. Marshall, 98 Va. 438, 36 S. E. Rep. 526.

Advantages of a Specific Lien.—The advantage of a specific lien is that the holder may subject the property without being involved in a settlement of the general estate of the debtor among his creditors. Armentrout v. Gibbons, 30 Gratt. 632.

And a charge reserved upon land may be enforced against it just as a deed of trust or mortgage, without first resorting to the personal property. Armentrout v. Gibbons, 30 Gratt. 632.

Court May Decree Payment of Interest on Installments Not Due.—Where there is a vendor's lien reserved and notes given for the purchase money there may be a decree for the payment of annual interest due on the deferred installment of purchase money in accordance with the contract of purchase. Bowman v. Duling, 39 W. Va. 619, 30 S. E. Rep. 567.

Lien May Be Reserved on Equitable Estates.—A vendor's lien may be reserved on the face of a deed conveying an equitable as well as a legal estate, and, in the absence of fraud or injustice, the vendor may take a reconveyance of the property conveyed in discharge of the balance of the purchase price. If, however, such reconveyance be set aside, the vendor's lien, in the absence of such fraud or injustice, will be revived and enforced for the benefit of the vendor. Dingus v. Minneapolis Improvement Co., 98 Va. 737, 37 S. E. Rep. 353.

When Note Payable to Third Party He Is Entitled to Lien.—Where deed conveying land reserves a lien for purchase money, not declaring in whose favor it is reserved, and a note or bond for the purchase money is, at the time of the conveyance, executed by the purchaser payable to a third party, he has a right to the debt, and the right to enforce the lien. James v. Burbridge, 33 W. Va. 272, 10 S. E. Rep. 396.

Lien Good Though Other Property Conveyed as Security.—A vendor of land retains the title in accordance with the contract. He has a lien on the land for the purchase money, as against creditors or incumbrancers of the vendee; and this though the vendee has subsequently executed a deed by which he conveys the other property to secure the purchase money. Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148.

2. LIEN ON BOTH PERSONAL AND REAL PROPERTY.—A lien cannot be enforced on the land, only when there is one given for both land and personally unless it be ascertained precisely how much of the note represents the price of the land. Clarke v. Curtis, 11 Leigh 589.

But where a lease is sold with certain personal property thereon for a gross sum for both, and in the writing transferring the lease and the personal property a lien is reserved for the payment of the purchase money, as between the parties to the contract of sale and those having actual notice of it, the lien will be declared valid and will be enforced by a sale of both real and personal property for the purchase money of both. Cole v. Smith, 24 W. Va. 287.

3. ON PROPERTY OF MARRIED WOMAN.—The corpus of a married woman's separate real estate can be affected or charged, by the vendor's lien when it has been reserved, or by a conveyance or specific lien created by deed, in which her husband has united with her, and which she executed after privy examination, whether her trustee has in any way united in the deed creating the specific lien on the separate real estate or not, unless she is restrained by the instrument creating the separate estate from so doing by express words, or by an intent so clear as to be the equivalent of express words. Weinberg v. Rempe, 15 W. Va. 831.

Corpus May Be Sold to Satisfy Lien.—Where a deed conveying land to a married woman as separate estate reserves a lien or charge upon it for money, the fee or corpus may be sold for its payment. Burbridge v. Sadler, 46 W. Va. 39, 32 S. E. Rep. 1028.

C. LIEN BY RETENTION OF TITLE.—A vendor retaining the title retains a lien on the land for the purchase money in the hands of a second purchaser. Stuart v. Abbott, 9 Gratt. 252.

And a vendor retaining the legal title occupies a position different from and higher than one who has parted with the legal title and relies on the mere implied equitable lien. Yancey v. Mauck, 15 Gratt. 300.

Statute of Limitations Not Applicable.—Where a vendor of land retains the title for the purchase money, his lien is not affected by any lapse of time short of the period sufficient to raise the presumption of payment. Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 243.

Binding Although Vendee Conveyed Other Property in Trust to Secure Debt.—In the case of Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148, it was held that the vendor retaining the legal title may resort to the land as against creditors and incumbrancers of the vendee, although the vendee had subsequently executed a deed by which he conveyed other property to secure the purchase money. Stoner v. Harris, 81 Va. 460.

Y sells land to M and is to convey it when the first payment is made. Before this payment falls due they make an arrangement by which M executes his bond, with Y as his surety, to S for a debt due from Y to S equal to the whole purchase money of the land; and the bonds of M are surrendered to him and destroyed. M becomes insolvent and conveys the land to secure creditors; and afterwards Y is compelled to pay the bond to S. Y not having parted with the title, may subject the land in equity to the payment of the purchase money. Yancey v. Mauck, 15 Gratt. 300.

D. ASSIGNMENT.

Nature of Interest Assigned.—An assignee of a vendor's lien is an assignee of a mere chose in action, and the assignment carries no interest in the land upon which the debt is secured. Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 694, and the assignor of such a debt therefore has merely a barren legal title, while the beneficial interest is in his assignee, who must be a party to the suit. Equity deals with the real parties in interest and if they are not before the court no proper decree can be made. Castleman v. Berry, 86 Va. 604, 10 S. E. Rep. 884; Campbell v. Shipman, 87 Va. 655, 13 S. E. Rep. 114; Grove v. Judy, 24 W. Va. 294; Kellam v. Sayre, 30 W. Va. 198, 8 S. E. Rep. 589; Penn v. Hearon, 94 Va. 774, 27 S. E. Rep. 599.

Lien Follows Debt—Priorities.—Where land is sold and notes or bonds which are secured by lien on the land are given for the purchase money, and are assigned, the lien goes with the bond or note. Page v. Booth, 1 Rob. 161; McClintic v. Wise, 25 Gratt. 448; Grubbs v. Wysors, 32 Gratt. 127; Board v. Wilson, 34 W. Va. 609, 13 S. E. Rep. 778; Briggs v. Enslow, 44 W. Va. 499, 29 S. E. Rep. 1008. And although the evidence of debt is subsequently due to one held by the vendor it will take priority over it. Briggs v. Enslow, 44 W. Va. 499, 29 S. E. Rep. 1008.

And a vendor may pursue land in the hands of a purchaser with notice, for the balance of the unpaid purchase money. Graves v. McCall, 1 Call 414.

Assignee Takes Subject to Equities of Assignor but Not to Third Parties of Which He Has No Notice.—Though an assignee of a bond given for the purchase price of land takes it subject to any equity of the obligor, that attached to it in the hands of the obligee, he does not take it subject to any of a third person not a party to the bond of which he has no notice. Moore v. Holcombe, 3 Leigh 597.

Debts to Be Satisfied in Order of Assignment.—Bonds secured by the vendor's lien assigned at different times to different persons, must be satisfied out of the proceeds of the land upon which they are secured in the order of their assignment. McClintic v. Wise, 25 Gratt. 448; Paxton v. Rich, 85 Va. 378, 7 S. E. Rep. 581.

In 1859, by written contract, H. and B. exchanged lands, B. giving bonds for boot. H. sold his tract to G. and I., taking their bonds. No conveyances. H. assigned some of the bonds to plaintiff. Then H. G., I. and B.'s widow assayed to annul the exchange the sale, and the bonds. H. took his former land back, and sold it to L. on condition he would assume payment of B.'s bonds, and the widow took possession of B.'s former land; but no care was taken of the assignee's interests. Held, the assignee can subject H.'s former land to the lien of B.'s bonds, and B.'s former land to the lien of the bonds of G. and I. Ginter v. Breeden, 90 Va. 565, 19 S. E. Rep. 656.

E. WAIVER OF LIEN.

1. IN GENERAL.—A court of equity will never compel a vendor to part with the legal title until the purchase money has been paid, or the lien therefor has been waived or extinguished. It has been said to be a natural equity, that when land has been sold it should stand charged with unpaid purchase money, and that a court of equity considers a debt as never discharged until it is paid to the proper person and by the proper person. Watts v. Kinney, 3 Leigh 272; Knisely v. Williams, 3 Gratt. 265; Yancey v. Mauck, 15 Gratt. 300; Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. 186; Frazier v. Hendren, 80 Va. 265.

A lien is generally presumed, and the burden is on the personal purchaser to show that it is waived which must be clearly proved. McCandlish v. Keen 13 Gratt. 615.

Under the old law giving an implied lien for purchase money on conveyance of the legal title, as under the present law, where a lien is reserved, it is a difficult matter to show a waiver of a lien; it must be clear. But it is more so where the title is reserved. First, because the very retention of title plainly manifests an intention to still hold the land liable; and, second, a court of equity is so unwilling to make a man give up his land for nothing. The force of this fact the retention of the legal title—will be found often emphasized as of controlling influence. Cole v. Withers, 33 Gratt. 186, 193; Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148; Hess v. Dille, 23 W. Va. 90; Warren v. Branch, 15 W. Va. 38. See JUDGE ALLEN's opinion in Yancey v. Mauck, 15 Gratt. 300; Mansfield v. Dameron, 42 W. Va. 794, 25 S. E. Rep. 527.

Waiver by Releasing Tract Ultimately Liable.—If a person holding a lien on two separate tracts of land releases the tract which is ultimately liable therefor, such release operates in equity to release the other tract, also, if in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value. Evans v. Kelley, 49 W. Va. 181, 38 S. E. Rep. 497.

Manner of Waiving.—A vendor's lien may be extinguished by the payment of the purchase money, or it may be waived or surrendered by the voluntary act of the vendor. Frazier v. Hendren, 80 Va. 265.

And where land is sold on credit and the title retained, and the vendors bring suit and sell the land under a decree, such sale releases the lien for the purchase money. Woods v. Ellis, 85 Va. 471, 7 S. E. Rep. 852.

An Agreement to Rescind.—Where a contract was entered into for the sale of land, the purchase price agreed on and notes given, deed delivered and lien reserved, but subsequently an agreement was made, to rescind the sale at future time, and the deed and notes were to be returned, but before the time for the return of the deed and notes, the vendor filed a bill to enforce his lien, the court held, that by the agreement to rescind the lien was released. McCutcheon v. Ingraham, 33 W. Va. 378, 9 S. E. Rep. 260.

Payment of Money Into Court.—Where a father deeds a son land in consideration that he pay his sisters a certain amount of money, which is tendered one of them before the end of a year after the father's death, and which is refused by the sister to which it is tendered and not again demanded, it may be paid into court after proper notice, which will amount to a release of the vendor's lien, so far as it secures that sum. Thompson v. Lyon, 40 W. Va. 87, 20 S. E. Rep. 812.

Reserving Rent Not Waiver.—Where a tenement was sold and the vendor reserved the rent, the reservation was not a waiver of his lien for the unpaid purchase money. Kyles v. Talts, 6 Gratt. 44.

Transfer or Discharge Need Not Be Recorded.—A transfer or discharge of a lien for purchase money need not be recorded to bind a subsequent assignee, it being good as to him though he have no notice of the transfer or discharge, however necessary notice to the debtor may be. Tingle v. Fisher, 20 W. Va. 498; Fleshman v. Hoylman, 27 W. Va. 728; Turk v. Skiles, 45 W. Va. 82, 30 S. E. Rep. 234.

Release by One Executor.—If one of the executors contracted to release a lien, it being the only security for the debt, would not be enforced in a court of equity against the other executors. Stuart v. Abbott, 9 Gratt. 252.

2. BY ACCEPTING NEW NOTE OR TAKING RECEIPT.—Giving a receipt or taking a note, with security, from the purchaser, or taking the note of a third party, specifying in either case that it is for the purchase money, will not, while the title remains in the vendor, be an extinguishment of the vendor's lien, unless the purchase money has been actually paid. And taking a note from the debtor, or a note of a third party, is no discharge of the debt, unless it is expressly agreed between the creditor and debtor that it is in absolute payment thereof. Dunlap v. Shanklin, 10 W. Va. 663; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Good, 21 W. Va. 455; Hess v. Dill, 23 W. Va. 90; Mansfield v. Dameron, 42 W. Va. 794, 25 S. E. Rep. 527; James v. Burbridge, 33 W. Va. 272, 10 S. E. Rep. 396.

Executing New Note to Third Party.—Where the note or bond were originally payable to the grantor in the deed, but afterwards, with his assent, the purchaser takes up that note or bond, and, in place of it, executes one to the third party, this does not extinguish the lien, but the third party becomes entitled to the debt, and to the lien as its incident. James v. Burbridge, 33 W. Va. 272, 10 S. E. Rep. 396.

3. BY OBTAINING JUDGMENT.—A vendor does not lose his lien by obtaining a judgment against the vendee for the purchase money of land. Kane v. Mann, 98 Va. 239, 24 S. E. Rep. 688.

4. BY ACCEPTING PERSONAL SECURITY.—A purchases a tract of land and gives bonds with B as his surety for the purchase money, but never takes a conveyance, nor pays the money. The vendor does not lose his lien upon the land, by having taken personal security. And in such case, the surety may go into a court of equity to subject the land to the payment of the debt, before he has been compelled to pay it himself. Hatcher v. Hatcher, 1 Rand. 53. But see Warren v. Branch, 15 W. Va. 21.

But if a contract is made for the sale of land, and nothing be said in the contract about the vendor's lien being reserved, and bond and personal security be taken for the purchase money, this alone will not amount to a waiver of the vendor's lien; but if it be shown by direct evidence, or by the circumstances of the case, that the vendor relied only on the bond and personal security, the vendor's lien is waived, and he would be required to execute a deed without reserving the vendor's lien. Warren v. Branch, 15 W. Va. 22.

Executing Conveyance, Taking Bond and Security.—A vendor of land, by executing a conveyance and taking bond and security for the purchase money, discharges the land from his equitable lien; even while it continues the property of the purchaser. Wilson v. Graham, 5 Munf. 297.

Surrendering a Bond and Taking an Order Which is Dishonored Not Surrender of Lien.—A vendor of land takes a bond and retains the title, and afterwards he agrees with the vendee to receive an order on a third person for the amount of the bond, the bond is surrendered and the order taken, but when presented the drawee refuses to accept it, the surrendering of the bond does not release the land from the vendor's lien for the purchase money, nor is the vendor bound to wait until the time when the order would have been payable before enforcing his lien. Knisely v. Williams, 3 Gratt. 253.

5. BY LACHES.

Laches Must Be Gross and Unexplained.—Laches, and even gross laches, is not enough to raise a presumption of the payment or the abandonment of a vendor's lien; it must be gross laches unexplained, together with evidence affording the presumption of abandonment of the right. Ginter v. Breeden, 90 Va. 573, 19 S. E. Rep. 656.

A party holding a title bond for a track of land assigned to another party in consideration of the assignment of a debt of $300 on a third party, $225 of which is conceded to have been paid to the person who assigned the title bond in her lifetime. She lived 17 years after its assignment without asserting any claim for any balance unpaid to her. Her administrator sued to enforce a vendor's lien for a balance of $75 and interest thereon. He does not produce any note or bond on the third party, and the third party is also dead. The widow of the third party swears that he was able to pay, and did pay, the debt. Under these circumstances, it is proper to treat the debt as paid, and to refuse the relief prayed for. Duffield v. Butler, 34 W. Va. 624, 12 S. E. Rep. 776.

6. BY ACCEPTING MORTGAGE OR DEED OF TRUST.—A vendor taking a mortgage of the subject sold to secure the purchase money, can only claim under the mortgage, and according to its terms: the mortgage supersedes the implied equitable lien for purchase money, which but for the mortgage would have attached to the subject. Little v. Brown, 2 Leigh 353; Hunton v. Wood (Va.), 43 S. E. Rep. 186; Warren v. Branch, 15 W. Va. 21.

And where the holder of a vendor's lien joins with the owner of the land charged with such lien in a deed of trust granting the land by the words, "grant, bargain, sell, and confirm," to a trustee in trust to secure a debt to a third party, and to pay the balance of proceeds of sale under it to the owner of the land owning the vendor's lien. Such deed of trust will discharge the vendor's lien as to both the debt secured by the deed of trust and the owner of the land. Such deed of trust is as to the owner of the land a grant, and as to the holder of the lien a confirmation. Turk v. Skiles, 45 W. Va. 82, 30 S. E. Rep. 234; Taylor v. Adams, Gilmer 329.

Additional Property.—A vendor of land retains the title in accordance with the contract. He has a lien on the land for the purchase money as against creditors or incumbrancers of the vendee; and this though the vendee has subsequently executed a deed by which he conveys other property to secure the purchase money. Lewis v. Caperton, 8 Gratt. 148.

F. SUBROGATION.

Purchaser under a Void Decree.—A purchaser of land under a void decree, whose money has been applied upon liens on the land valid against the owner of the land, will be entitled to charge such money upon such land by substitution to the right of the creditor, upon disaffirmance of the sale. Hull v. Hull, 35 W. Va. 155, 18 S. E. Rep. 49.

Surety Paying Debt.—A owes B a debt evidenced by a note secured by a lien on A's real estate. C executes to B a note of like amount as collateral security for A's debt. If C pays the note executed by him as collateral security, he is entitled to be substituted to the benefit of the lien on A's real estate given to secure the original debt. Hevener v. Berry, 17 W. Va. 474.

Where A purchased a tract of land from B and executed his notes for the purchase money and a deed of trust on the land to secure B, and then sells the land to C with the agreement, that C shall take up the notes as they become due, and C does take up the first note, he stands in the shoes of A and not B, and cannot be subrogated to the rights of B in the trust deed. Bier v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 830.

Purchaser Paying Lien without Assignment.

Where a purchaser of land, pursuant to his contract, pays a lien on the land, binding his vendor's estate in it, and the contract is abandoned by the parties, and the vendor becomes unable to execute it, though the purchaser took no assignment when he paid the lien, yet he is entitled to be substituted to such lien, and equity keeps it alive for his indemnity. James v. Burbridge, 33 W. Va. 272, 10 S. E. Rep. 396; Hoke v. Jones, 33 W. Va. 501, 10 S. E. Rep. 775.

Commissioner Advancing Money to Purchaser.—A purchaser executed ten bonds for deferred payments on land purchased of complainant as commissioner. When five were paid a new commissioner replaced him. The new commissioner subsequently reported all the bonds paid, and a deed was made to the purchaser. Complainant filed his bill against purchaser, alleging he had furnished him money to pay the sixth bond, and had obtained judgment for same, and prayed that the vendor's lien reserved on the land when sold be enforced for his benefit. Held, he was entitled to the relief prayed for. Price v. Davis, 88 Va. 939, 14 S. E. Rep. 704.

Surety Cannot Compel Payment by Principal Debtor before Paying Debt Himself.—Where a vendor's lien is retained to secure the payment of several bonds given for the purchase money of lands, and a judgment is obtained at law by the assignee of one of the bonds against the principal on the bond and his surety, the surety cannot come into a court of equity and compel such assignee to exhaust his vendor's lien before enforcing the collection of his judgment by execution against the surety, although it is shown that the principal debtor is insolvent. Armstrong v. Poole, 30 W. Va. 666, 5 S. E. Rep. 267. See further, monographic note on "Subrogation" appended to Janney v. Stephens, 2 Pat. & H. 11.

G. PRIORITIES.

1. DOWER.

Vendor's Implied Lien.—A vendor's implied lien is paramount to widow's right of dower, although the husband was actually seised of the land during coverture. Wilson v. Davison, 2 Rob. 384; Robison v. Shacklett, 29 Gratt. 99. But see Blair v. Thompson 11 Gratt. 441.

Vendor's Express Lien.—When the legal title is retained until the payment of the purchase money, there is a lien on the land, which is paramount to the dower of the purchaser's widow. Roush v. Miller, 39 W. Va. 638, 20 S. E. Rep. 663; Sinnett v. Cralle, 4 W. Va. 600; Hunter v. Hunter, 10 W. Va. 321; Holden v. Boggess, 20 W. Va. 63; Martin v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 579.

And the lien remains as long as the legal title is retained. Roush v. Miller, 39 W. Va. 638, 20 S. E. Rep. 663; Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 607; Findley v. Armstrong, 28 W. Va. 113.

And it is error to decree the sale of the whole of a tract of land, subject to the widow's dower, when it appears that there is a vendor's lien on a one-twelfth interest thereof. The one-twelfth interest should have been sold free from dower. Sinnett v. Cralle, 4 W. Va. 600.

Mrs. W. permitted M. to buy, at a sale under a decree, their deceased father's land for much less than its value, on condition he settled part on her. After buying it, he gave her possession of part. After that, he agreed to hold the land in partnership with others. Later, he sold a portion, including what she possessed, receiving, as part payment, another tract, whereof he gave her possession, agreeing to convey it to her, in consideration of money he owed her and her balance of all interest in the former tract. Held, she was a purchaser of the latter tract, and her title is paramount to the interest of M.'s partners and to the dower right of his widow. Walker v. Grayson, 86 Va. 337, 10 S. E. Rep. 51.

Conveyance by Husband and Wife to a Purchaser with Notice.—The lien of a grantor for the purchase money is prior to the widow's dower, and a conveyance by the husband and wife to a purchaser with notice will not effect the vendor's lien. Culbertson v. Stevens, 82 Va. 406, 4 S. E. Rep. 607.

2. MECHANICS' LIEN.—The vendor's lien in this state is superior to the mechanic's lien. Charleston Lumber & M. Co. v. Brockmyer, 18 W. Va. 586.

3. MORTGAGE.—Where a part of a tract of land is sold subject to a vendor's lien, and the purchasers sell to a subvendee, who executes his bond for the purchase money which is assigned by the vendee to the vendor, the subvendee executes a mortgage on the land informing the mortgagee at the time that he is indebted to the original vendor but failing to state in what way, it was held that the vendor's lien was prior to the mortgage. Yancey v. Blakemore, 95 Va. 263, 28 S. E. Rep. 336.

4. JUDGMENTS.

Unrecorded Contract for the Sale of Land.—Land sold and purchased under a written contract which has not been recorded, though the purchasers have paid all the purchase money and have been for years in possession under their contract before a judgment has been recovered against their vendor, is liable to satisfy the judgment. Young v. Devries, 31 Gratt. 304. But see Shipe v. Repass, 28 Gratt. 716; Whitehill v. Bassett, 24 W. Va. 142.

But land sold and purchased under a parol contract, the purchaser having been put in possession, and holding the possession under the contract before a judgment has been recovered against their vendor, is not liable to satisfy the judgment. Young v. Devries, 31 Gratt. 304; Snyder v. Botkin, 37 W. Va. 355, 16 S. E. Rep. 591.

Court May Provide for Judgments to Be Paid First.—Upon a bill filed to enforce a vendor's lien the decree may provide for a sale, and that judgments against the vendor amounting to only a small portion of the amount due him shall be paid out of the cash payment at the sale. Carper v. Marshall, 98 Va. 438, 36 S. E. Rep. 526.

Balance May Be Applied to Judgment.—A vendor of land, who has retained the title, files a bill against the widow and infant children of the vendee, for a sale of the land to satisfy his debt. The widow answers, claiming dower in the land subject to the vendor's lien. Judgment creditors of the vendee may make themselves parties to the cause, and have the land, subjected to the vendor's lien and the widow's dower, and the balance if any applied to the payment of their debts. Simmons v. Lyles, 27 Gratt. 922.

Purchaser by Parol Contract.—A purchaser of land by parol contract which has been so far executed as to vest in him the right to compel his vendor to execute the parol contract in a court of equity has an equitable right in the land purchased, which a court of equity will fully protect against the lien of a subsequent judgment creditor of his vendor. Snyder v. Botkin, 37 W. Va. 355, 16 S. E. Rep. 591.

5. PURCHASE UNDER QUITCLAIM DEED.—The grantee in a quitclaim deed, with covenant of special warranty, which purports to convey "such interest only as they (the grantors) now have, whatever that may be" takes in subordination to a prior unrecorded deed, and such quitclaim deed cannot be introduced in evidence to defeat the title deduced under the prior unrecorded deed. Va. & Tenn. Coal & Iron Co. v. Fields, 94 Va. 102, 26 S. E. Rep. 423.

H. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

1. ENFORCEMENT OF VENDOR'S LIEN.

a. Jurisdiction.—A court of equity has jurisdiction to enforce a vendor's lien on land for the unpaid purchase money. Robinson v. Dix, 18 W. Va. 528; Moore v. Smith, 26 W. Va. 379.

Even though the bond has been lost, and a copy of the deed cannot be produced by the vendor. Moore v. Smith, 26 W. Va. 379; Robinson v. Dix, 18 W. Va. 528.

But equity will not sanction the bringing a number of suits to enforce liens against the real estate of a debtor, and thus unnecessarily harass or oppress him. Peery v. Elliott (Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 919.

Enforcement Matter of Right.—The enforcement of a lien is a matter of right; the specific execution of a contract is a matter of sound judicial discretion. Smith v. Henkel, 81 Va. 524.

So on principles of quia timet chancery will entertain a bill by a vendee of land against his vendor to compel the vendor to pay out of his own land liens binding the lands of both, where the vendor is insolvent except as to his land, and that may prove inadequate security. Weekly v. Hardesty, 48 W. Va. 30, 35 S. E. Rep. 880.

Enforcement Where Vendee Has Sold Land.—Where a lien is reserved for the purchase price of land, and the vendee has sold it, the proper method to enforce the lien is by an independent suit against the original vendee. Tunstall v. Withers, 86 Va. 892, 11 S. E. Rep. 565.

Apparent Remedy at Law Not to Effect Jurisdiction.—A vendor seeking to enforce his lien in equity cannot be deprived of his right therein, because of the fact that there is an apparent remedy at law. Ayres v. Robins, 30 Gratt. 106.

Property under Control of Bankruptcy Court.—When the bankruptcy court orders the property sold subject to the liens, there is no reason why the state court should not proceed to enforce the liens. Beall v. Walker, 36 W. Va. 741.

And where neither the bankruptcy court, the assignee nor any creditor objects, the state court has jurisdiction to proceed with such suit to enforce the liens. Beall v. Walker, 36 W. Va. 741.

b. Venue.—Where a bill was filed to enforce a vendor's lien on land, a portion of which was in Maryland and a portion in West Virginia, it was held that the Maryland court could proceed to a decree and have land in Virginia sold to satisfy the lien and such proceedings were not subject to the Virginia court unless the Maryland court was mistaken in the law of Virginia applicable to the case. Piedmont C. & I. Co. v. Green, 3 W. Va. 54.

2. PARTIES.

a. In General.—In a suit to enforce a vendor's lien on land it is not necessary to make persons having subsequent liens thereon parties, nor to have an account taken to ascertain the priorities of the liens. Arnold v. Coburn, 32 W. Va. 272, 9 S. E. Rep. 31; Linn v. Patton, 10 W. Va. 187; Neeley v. Rulesy, 26 W. Va. 686.

But our cases before and since the statute, § 7 p. 139, Code 1891, require owners of all judgment and all other liens to be brought in up to the date. If the institution of the suit apparent on the judgment lien docket or records of the courts of the county or counties in which the land lies, or apparent in deeds of trust, or other deeds or papers constituting specific liens on record or existing, recorded or not. Hoffman v. Shields, 4 W. Va. 490; Neely v. Jones, 18 W. Va. 625; Norris v. Bean, 17 W. Va. 655; Marling v. Robrecht, 13 W. Va. 440; Bilmyer v. Sherman, 23 W. Va. 656; Bansimer v. Fell, 39 W. Va. 448.

19 S. E. Rep. 545; McMillan v. Hickman, 35 W. Va. 705, 14 S. E. Rep. 227; Bank v. Watson, 39 W. Va. 342, 19 S. E. Rep. 413; Livesay v. Fearnster, 21 W. Va. 83.

Trustee and Cestui Que Trust Must Be Parties.—If land on which a vendor's lien exists is to be conveyed by a trust deed to secure debts it is proper in suit to enforce the lien to make the trustees parties, but unnecessary to make the cestui que trust a party before decreeing in favor of the person entitled to the vendor's lien. Arnold v. Coburn, 32 W. Va. 272, 9 S. E. Rep. 21.

Trustee Need Not Be Party When Trust Is Released.—Though, when suit was brought to enforce a vendor's lien, the land was under a prior lien by deed of trust, making the trustee and creditor necessary parties, yet where, pending it, the trust has been released by release, revesting legal title in the owner, decree may be made, without making such trustee and creditor parties. McClagherty v. Croft, 43 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. Rep. 246.

Original Vendee Who Has Alienated Must Be Party.—Though the original vendee has alienated land conveyed to him with lien for purchase money reserved, yet he must be a party to any suit to enforce the lien. Tunstall v. Withers, 86 Va. 892, 11 S. E. Rep. 565.

Assignor Need Not Be Party.—An assignor of a chose in action, though secured by a vendor's lien reserved on real estate, cannot sue in equity for the benefit of his assignee to collect the debt, the assignee must be a party and the reason for the rule is that equity deals only with the real parties in interest, and if they are not before the court no proper decree can be made in the cause. Penn v. Heaton, 94 Va. 773, 27 S. E. Rep. 599; Hurt v. Miller, 95 Va. 37, 27 S. E. Rep. 831; Castleman v. Berry, 86 Va. 604, 10 S. E. Rep. 884; Campbell v. Shipman, 87 Va. 655, 13 S. E. Rep. 114; Grove v. Judy, 24 W. Va. 294; Kellam v. Sayre, 30 W. Va. 198, 3 S. E. Rep. 589.

When Administrator Should Be Party.—In enforcing a vendor's lien against the estate of the vendee after his death the court ought to require the personal estate in the hands of the administrator to be first ascertained, and should ascertain how much of it is applicable to the payment of the purchase money due, and should require the personalty to be so applied, before it decrees a sale of the land to pay the lien. In such case or course the administrator is a necessary party to the suit. Bierne v. Brown, 10 W. Va. 748; Sommerville v. Sommerville, 26 W. Va. 482.

And in a suit to subject lands descended to the heir, to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, the personal representative of the ancestor is a necessary party. Sommerville v. Sommerville, 26 W. Va. 482.

Heirs Should Be Parties.—Where a bill is filed by the administrator of the vendor against the vendee, to subject the land to pay the balance of the purchase money, and vendee answers, and insists that the heirs of the vendor should be made parties; but the court below, without requiring this to be done, makes a decree for the sale of the land. Upon appeal this court amends the decree, and directs that the heirs shall be made parties before a sale of the land. Mott v. Carter, 26 Gratt. 127.

Prior Lienors Should Be Parties.—In a suit in equity, to sell land to enforce the payment of the purchase money, if it appears that there is a prior lien for unpaid purchase money on the land, those entitled to the benefit of such prior purchase money lien, should be made parties to the suit. Dickinson v. Railroad Company, 7 W. Va. 390.

When Not to Be Parties.—In a suit to enforce a purchase money lien reserved in a deed conveying legal title, with only a covenant of general warranty, it is not necessary to make prior lienors, holding liens against the property, parties, nor to refer the case to ascertain such liens, unless it appear that the vendor is insolvent. But if the plaintiff in his bill shows such liens, and proposes to have the purchase money go to discharge them, the owners of such prior liens must be parties. McClagherty v. Croft, 43 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. Rep. 246.

Judgment Lienors Not to Be Parties.—In a suit by a vendor to enforce a vendor's lien, other lienors having judgment liens on the vendee's lands ought not to be made parties to such suit, nor should a notice to all persons holding liens on the real estate of the debtor be published under § 7, ch. 126 of Acts of 1882, this section having no application to a suit brought to enforce a vendor's lien. Moreland v. Metz, 24 W. Va. 119.

Wife Need Not Be Party.—It is not necessary to make the wife a party to a suit in equity brought to enforce the payment of an ordinary purchase money lien debt against the husband in his lifetime where the land was purchased by him. Holden v. Bogges, 20 W. Va. 78.

Note Payable to Third Party.—When a note or bond were originally payable to the grantor in a deed, but afterwards, with his assent, the purchaser takes up the note or bond, and, in the place of it, executes one to a third party, he becomes entitled to the debt, and, in a suit by him or his assignees to enforce it, the grantor, or, after his death, his heirs or personal representative, are not necessary parties. James v. Burbridge, 33 W. Va. 272, 10 S. E. Rep. 595.

b. Effect of Want of Proper Parties.—Where an order is obtained for the sale of land by one party without notice to other parties interested, and also without their knowledge, it is null and void as to them, and the purchaser is liable for the purchase money, and a lien exists on the land. Beery v. Irick, 23 Gratt. 614.

3. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—This court has repeatedly decided that although the remedy on a claim secured by a mortgage, deed of trust, or vendor's lien may be barred at law, yet the remedy in equity to enforce the lien is not affected by any lapse of time short of the period sufficient to raise the presumption of payment. Paxton v. Rich, 85 Va. 378, 7 S. E. Rep. 531; Hanna v. Wilson, 3 Gratt. 243; Smith v. Washington, etc., R. Co., 33 Gratt. 617; Bowie v. Poor School Society of Westmoreland, 75 Va. 300; Stimpson v. Bishop, 82 Va. 190; Hull v. Hull, 35 W. Va. 155, 18 S. E. Rep. 49; Morehead v. Horner, 30 W. Va. 548, 4 S. E. Rep. 448; Wayt v. Carwithen, 21 W. Va. 516; Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. 187; Pitzer v. Burns, 7 W. Va. 63.

And the personal obligation of a debt is one thing, and a lien for its security another; and the lien is enforceable in equity, although the remedy at law is barred. Tunstall v. Withers, 86 Va. 892, 11 S. E. Rep. 565.

4. ORDER OF SUBJECTING LAND CLAIMED.—The law is well settled that where land is subject to the lien of a judgment or other encumbrance, is sold in parcels to different persons by successive alienations, it is chargeable in the hands of the purchaser in the inverse order of such alienations. Whitten v. Saunders, 75 Va. 553; Henkle v. Allstadt, 4 Gratt. 284; Jones v. Myrick, 8 Gratt. 179; Alford v. Helms, 6 Gratt. 90; Miller v. Holland, 84 Va. 652, 5 S. E. Rep. 701; Litchfield v. Preston, 98 Va. 530, 37 S. E. Rep. 6; Gracey v. Myers, 15 W. Va. 202.

5. THE BILL.

Original or Supplemental Bill.—Where a judicial sale is confirmed, and the court directs the commissioner to convey the land to the purchaser, retaining in the deed a lien for the purchase money, and such conveyance is made, and the purchaser sells the land and conveys it to a third party, and such third party sells and conveys it to others, and the purchaser from the commissioner fails to pay the balance of the purchase money, the lien should be enforced by original bill. If the original cause is ended, or if still pending for any purpose, by supplemental bill filed in such cause. Glenn v. Blackford, 23 W. Va. 182.

Not to Be Verified by Affidavit.—Where a bond given for the purchase money for land sold has been lost, though a copy of the deed cannot be produced, a bill properly alleging these facts filed to enforce the vendor's lien should be sustained on demurrer even though it be not sustained by affidavit. Moore v. Smith, 26 W. Va. 379.

Accounting and Sale Does Not Render Bill Multifarious.—A bill is not multifarious because it pays for an accounting, and for a sale of land. Carskadon v. Minke, 26 W. Va. 729.

Administrator Need Not Show His Authority in Bill.—To a bill filed by an administrator to enforce a vendor's lien, in which he alleges the sale and conveyance of a tract of land to a purchaser, and that there is a balance of the purchase money for the land remaining unpaid, to secure the payment of which a vendor's lien was reserved by him on the face of the conveyance, which was with general warranty, which deed of conveyance and the bond evidencing the amount of purchase money remaining unpaid are exhibited and made part of the bill, a demurrer filed by the defendant will not be sustained, for the reason that the plaintiff does not show by his bill under what authority he sold, and in what right he became invested with the title to land. Bartlett v. Bartlett, 34 W. Va. 33, 11 S. E. Rep. 732.

Must State Interest of Parties.—When suit is brought to enforce a vendor's lien, and sales have been made by the vendee of portions of the land against which the lien is sought to be enforced, and the plaintiff files an amended bill, making the purchasers of such portions parties defendant, but fails to set out in such amended bill the interests of such parties, and the dates of their respective purchases, by exhibiting copies of the conveyances to them, or otherwise, such amended bill is demurrable. McGlaughlin v. McGraw, 44 W. Va. 715, 30 S. E. Rep. 64.

6. ANSWER—WITHDRAWAL OF.—Where the defendant is entitled to an abatement because of the fraud of the plaintiff in misrepresenting the quantity of the land in the tract sold, the court ought to permit the defendant to withdraw his answer and file a another corresponding with the facts proven. Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 327.

Relief May Be Asked for in Answer.—If the bill of injunction sets out a deed, in which the vendor's lien is reserved, and alleges, that it is fatally defective in not effectually conveying the contingent right of dower of a wife, who signed it, and alleges that more is for this and other reasons claimed to be due under the deed of trust than is really due, and such bill asks general relief, affirmative relief by the enforcement of the vendor's lien may be asked in the answer; for such relief is confined to matters involved in the original bill. McMullen v. Eagan, 21 W. Va. 234.

7. REPLICATION OR REPLY.

Where Answer Sets Up Defenses of Deficiency the Replication Should Be General.—When a bill is filed to enforce a vendor's lien, and the answer asks an abatement of the price on account of a deficiency in the quantity of the land, because of fraud in the vendor misrepresenting in the deed the quantity of the land, such answer in either case alleges no new matter, which constitutes a claim for affirmative relief within the meaning of § 35, ch. 125 of the Code of West Virginia, but presents simply a defense to the plaintiff's demand, and therefore the court should not permit a special replication to such answer to be filed, but only a general replication. Depue v. Sergeant, 21 W. Va. 326.

And where there is an answer calling for a special reply, and there is a general replication to it, and the party filing it has gone on and taken depositions as if there were a special reply denying it, and there has been a full hearing of the merits, as if there had been a special reply, a decree will not be reversed for want of such special reply. Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. Rep. 611.

8. DEMURRER.

Not Demurrable for Want of Parties.—In suit by vendors to recover price of land, a demurrer will not lie for want of proper parties on the ground that the money, when collected, has been appropriated to pay claims against the vendors. Woods v. Ellis, 35 Va. 471, 7 S. E. Rep. 362.

Demurrer Should State Name of Parties.—A demurrer to a bill for want of parties should properly name the necessary parties defendant, who have been omitted so as to enable the plaintiff to amend his bill and call the attention of the court to this defect; and if it does not, the demurrer cannot complain that the demurrer is not sustained; but the court ought in the final hearing of the cause, though the demurrer has been overruled, to decline to determine the cause on its merits, until the necessary parties defendant have been brought before the court by an amendment of the bill and have been given the opportunity to be heard. Robinson v. Dix, 18 W. Va. 528.

9. COMMISSIONS AND ACCOUNTS.

Answer Averring Liens but Not Insolvency Does Not Make It Necessary to Refer to Commissioner.—Where a bill was filed to enforce a vendor's lien and the answer averred that there were many judgment liens against the plaintiff's land, and that he did not have other lands beside the tract sold the defendant sufficient to discharge the liens, but did not aver that the plaintiff was insolvent, it was held that this would not justify an order setting aside the order for sale, nor was it necessary to send the cause to a commissioner to inquire into the matters set up in the answer. Neeley v. Rukeys, 26 W. Va. 686.

Commissioner Should Retain Title Until Money Paid.—It is bad practice upon the confirmation of a sale of land to order the commissioner to convey the legal title to the purchaser; the title should be retained until the purchase money is all paid. Glenn v. Blackford, 23 W. Va. 182.

Where Demurrer Sustained Bill Amended and New Parties Commissioner's Report Should Be Confirmed, and New Reference Ordered.—If a report be made showing the liens on a debtor's land and their priorities, which the bill asks may be sold, and afterwards a demurrer to the bill is sustained and an amended bill filed making a large number of lienors parties, who were not parties to the suit originally, such commissioner's report ought not to be confirmed but a new order of reference should be made by the court to ascertain the liens. Tavener v. Barrett, 21 W. Va. 658.

Wherewith Endorsements Bond Filed No Account Necessary.—Where in a suit to enforce vendor's lien the purchaser's bonds with credits endorsed thereon, are filed with the bill, and the answer does not claim additional credits, an account is not required before decree of sale. Smith v. Henkel, 31 Va. 534.

Account of Rents and Profits Not Necessary.—In suit to enforce liens reserved in favor of grantor in his conveyance of land, as provided by Code 1873, ch. 115, § 1, the court may decree sale of the land to satisfy the lien, with any previous account of rents and profits. Section 9, ch. 182, Code 1873, applying only to suits for the enforcement of judgment liens. Neff v. Wooding, 83 Va. 432, 2 S. E. Rep. 731.

Sale under Decree When Judgment Liens Attach Render Accounting Necessary.—Land which was under a lien for the benefit of the vendor was sold under an executory agreement, and was also sold under a decree for the satisfaction of the lien, but the price received when sold under the decree was not sufficient to pay the debt. The original vendor obtains judgment on one of the purchase money notes and the first purchaser obtains an injunction restraining the execution of the judgment and claiming damages for failure of vendor to make him a deed. Held, that it was error to dissolve the injunction, dismiss the bill, without ordering the account between parties. Nelson v. Phares, 33 W. Va. 270, 10 S. E. Rep. 308.

Where Lien Reserved.

Accounting Not Necessary.—In a suit to enforce the vendor's lien, the court may decree a sale of the land, on which the lien for the purchase money is reserved, without the amount and priorities of their liens being settled. Neeley v. Ruleys, 26 W. Va. 686; Arnold v. Coburn, 32 W. Va. 272, 9 S. E. Rep. 21; Cunningham v. Hedrick, 23 W. Va. 579; Lough v. Michael, 37 W. Va. 679, 17 S. E. Rep. 181. See Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. Rep. 611.

But in the case of Payne v. Webb, 23 W. Va. 558, which was a suit brought to enforce a vendor's lien, the court held: "It is the duty of the court, before it decrees a sale of land, to fix definitely both the amounts and priorities of the liens on it, and the failure to do either will be ground for the reversal of the decree." Triplett v. Lake, 43 W. Va. 428, 27 S. E. Rep. 363.

Although a decree of sale is entered, which from the facts then appearing is proper, and a sale is made thereunder, it will still be error for the court by a subsequent decree, which sets aside such sale, to order a resale of the land, if the facts, then appearing in the cause, show the existence of liens, the amounts and priorities of which have not been ascertained and fixed. In such case the court should set aside the former decree of sale and refer the cause to a commissioner or otherwise determine the amounts and priorities of the liens before ordering a resale. Payne v. Webb, 23 W. Va. 558.

And in the absence of evidence of record that other liens exist, a court of equity may in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien enter a decree of sale before ordering an account of the liens to be taken. Shickel v. Berryville, etc., Co., 99 Va. 88, 37 S. E. Rep. 818; McClagherty v. Croft, 43 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. Rep. 246.

10. DECREE.

Decree May Be Personal.—Upon a bill filed by a vendor to enforce a lien reserved for the purchase price of land, the complainant is entitled to a personal decree for the amount of his debt, and also to a decree for the sale of the land if the personal decree be not satisfied. But, in ordinary cases, the better practice is not to allow any execution on the decree until the land has been sold and the proceeds applied to the debt, and then to issue execution for the balance of the debt remaining unsatisfied. Fayette Land Co. v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co., 93 Va. 274, 24 S. E. Rep. 1016; Delinger v. Foltz, 93 Va. 729, 25 S. E. Rep. 998; Ayers v. Robins, 30 Gratt. 106.

But in the discretion of the court to authorize the plaintiff to enforce such personal decree without waiting for the collection of the proceeds of the land subject to such lien. Carskadon v. Minke, 26 W. Va. 730.

Decree May Be Made without Making Provisions for Future Notes.—In a suit to enforce the lien for one of several notes for purchase money of land, the court may decree a sale of it, without provision for other notes held by the plaintiff, not matured when the suit began, as this may be done in a further decree. Long v. Perine, 41 W. Va. 314, 23 S. E. Rep. 611. See also, Moore v. Green, 90 Va. 181, 17 S. E. Rep. 872.

But if the court, in enforcing such vendor's lien, aggregates the amount of principal and interest to the date of the decree, and then decrees that the defendants pay interest on such aggregate amount for several months prior to the date of the decree, this is such a mistake as may be safely amended on motion, under § 5 of c. 134 of the Code, and which should be amended on motion in the circuit court. Triplett v. Lake, 43 W. Va. 428, 27 S. E. Rep. 363.

11. SALE.

Interest Allowed from Date of Decree.—In enforcing a vendor's lien for purchase money, the court, in rendering its decree, will ascertain the aggregate amount of principal and interest due on the notes executed for such purchase money, for which the vendor's lien is retained, to the date of the decree, and decree that interest be paid on such aggregate from the date of the decree. Triplett v. Lake, 43 W. Va. 428, 27 S. E. Rep. 363.

Decree Shall Give a Day for Redemption.—Upon a decree to enforce the lien of a vendor for unpaid purchase money, the decree should give a day to the defendants to redeem the property, by paying up the amount charged upon it. Kyles v. Tait, 6 Gratt. 44. And as a general rule, the decree in such a case, should direct a sale on a reasonable credit. Pairo v. Bethell, 75 Va. 825; Brien v. Pittman, 12 Leigh 579; Haffey v. Birchetts, 11 Leigh 58; Kyles v. Tait, 6 Gratt. 44; Tennent v. Pattons, 6 Leigh 106.

Personal Property to Be Sold First.—In enforcing a vendor's lien against the estate of the vendee after his death the court ought to require the personal estate in the hands of the administrator to be first ascertained, and should ascertain how much of it is applicable to the payment of the purchase money due, and should require the personally to be so applied, before it decrees a sale of the land to pay the lien. Bierne v. Brown, 10 W. Va. 748; Sommerville v. Sommerville, 26 W. Va. 482. See also, Camden v. Haymond, 9 W. Va. 680.

And in a decree enforcing a vendor's lien, the sale should be proceeded with according to the general rules regulating judicial sales. Alford v. Helms, 6 Gratt. 90. See cross reference to monographic note on "Judicial Sales" appended to Walker v. Page, 21 Gratt. 636.

12. REVIVOR.—When the plaintiff in a chancery cause, to enforce a vendor's lien dies, the cause of action survives to his personal representative, and may be revived by bill of revivor, scire facias or by a simple motion that it proceed in the name of the personal representative of the plaintiff, which may be made without notice to the defendants. Galner v. Galner, 30 W. Va. 390, 4 S. E. Rep. 424.

But the defendants may hasten the prosecution or discontinuance of the suit by suggesting the death of the plaintiff on the record, and if no steps are taken to revive the suit in any of these modes, at or before the second term next after that on which the entry of record is made, the court ought to enter an order discontinuing the cause, which order can never after the adjournment of the court, be set aside, though the court may refuse to enter such order, or may set it aside at any time during the term. Gainer v. Gainer, 30 W. Va. 390, 4 S. E. Rep. 424.

XI. BONA FIDE PURCHASERS FOR VALUE AND WITHOUT NOTICE.

A. IN GENERAL.—The rules respecting purchasers without notice are framed for the protection of those who purchase the legal title and pay the purchase money in ignorance of an outstanding equity. Hughes v. Harvey, 75 Va. 200.

And a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, is a great favorite of a court of equity, and that court will not disarm such a purchaser of a legal advantage, but we must not permit ourselves to be misled by words or maxims in this matter. Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 159; Burwell v. Fauber, 21 Gratt. 463; National Valley Bank of Staunton v. Harman, 75 Va. 606.

Nor will a court of equity be astute to charge a constructive trust upon one who has acted honestly, and paid a full and fair consideration without notice or knowledge. Wilson v. Wall, 6 Wall. 83, 90; Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Gratt. 518; Connell v. Connell, 32 W. Va. 319, 9 S. E. Rep. 252.

Grounds for Making Notice Binding.—The ground of holding a purchaser bound, who has notice of an outstanding title in another, is, that he acts with a corrupt conscience in purchasing what in equity he knows belongs to another. Bumgardner v. Allen, 6 Munf. 439; Curtis v. Lunn, 6 Munf. 42.

B. WHO CONSIDERED PURCHASER AND ENTITLED TO PROTECTION.

1. TRUSTEE AND CESTUI QUI TRUST IN TRUST DEED.—It is well settled that trustees and beneficiaries in a deed of trust to secure bona fide debts are purchasers for valuable consideration. Wickham v. Martin, 13 Gratt. 427; Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 153; Exchange Bank v. Knox, 19 Gratt. 739; Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 694; Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. Rep. 813; Western, etc., Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 409; Douglass Merchandise Co. v. Laird, 37 W. Va. 687, 17 S. E. Rep. 188; Shurtz v. Johnson, 28 Gratt. 657; Cammack v. Soran, 30 Gratt. 292; Williams v. Lord, 75 Va. 404; Weinberg v. Rempe, 15 W. Va. 831.

But a deed of trust unrecorded is void against subsequent purchasers without notice. Weinberg v. Rempe, 15 W. Va. 829.

Trustees under a deed of trust to secure antecedent debts are purchasers for value. But whether they are bona fide purchasers without notice depends on the facts of the case. The open and peaceable possession of land under a claim of right is notice to all the world of the right or claim of the person in possession; and when one buys land in the possession of another than his vendor or grantor, he is bound to take notice of such possession and of all that it imports. Such notice is the same, in effect, as the notice which is imputed by the recording acts. A subsequent purchaser of such land is affected with notice of whatever claim or interest the person in possession has, and which an inquiry into the possession would have revealed. Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 153; Wickham v. Lewis, 13 Gratt. 427; Exchange Bank v. Knox, 19 Gratt. 739; Shurtz v. Johnson, 28 Gratt. 657, 667; Cammack v. Soran, 30 Gratt. 292; Williams v. Lord, 75 Va. 404; Witz v. Osburn, 83 Va. 230, 2 S. E. Rep. 33; Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. Rep. 813.

Trust Deed on Property Lying in One County When Judgment is Docketed in Another.—Judgments gotten in Accomac county will be subsequent to a deed of trust conveying the equity of redemption in land being in York county, the judgments not being docketed in Accomac county. the trustee and creditors were held to be purchasers for valuable consideration and without notice within the meaning of § 8, ch. 186, Code of 1860. Shurtz v. Johnson, 28 Gratt. 667; Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 153; Exchange Bank of Va. v. Knox, 19 Gratt. 739.

Deed Not Showing Trust—Secret Lien—Bona Fide Purchaser.—Where deeds do not upon their face show any trust to be held upon land therein conveyed, which land has been sold to third parties, judgments against the parties who allege to be secret beneficiaries in the deed, cannot be enforced against the lands in the hands of third parties, who are innocent purchasers without notice. Hill v. Ruffner, 3 W. Va. 538.

2. MORTGAGEE.—It is well settled that a mortgagee is a purchaser to the extent of his interest in the premises. Wickham v. Martin, 13 Gratt. 436; Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 698; Weinberg v. Rempe, 15 W. Va. 831; Davison v. Waite, 2 Munf. 527.

3. ASSIGNEE AND CREDITORS UNDER ASSIGNMENT.—The trustee in a deed of assignment made to secure creditors is regarded as a purchaser for value, and, in order to make void the deed, notice of the grantor's fraudulent intent must in some way be brought home to him or to the creditor. Douglass Merchandise Co. v. Laird, 37 W. Va. 687, 17 S. E. Rep. 188.

Where a vendor, by executory contract, sells real estate to an insolvent husband, who, after he has appreciated the value of the property by erecting a house thereon, requests the vendor to convey the same to his wife, in order to avoid the payment of a debt, and the vendor, with notice of this purpose, conveys the property to the wife, retaining in the deed a vendor's lien for the unpaid purchase money, such conveyance and retention of lien therein will be fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the husband; and the lien so retained will be held subordinate to the debts of such creditors. But, as between the wife and the vendor, such lien will be held binding, and enforced in a court of equity, even though it includes items not originally a part of the purchase money for the real estate. Holmes v. Harshberger, 31 W. Va. 516, 7 S. E. Rep. 452.

Trustee and Creditors under Assignment by Bank.—Where a bank is insolvent, the trustees are trustees of the creditors, not of the bank; and are purchasers and assignees for value of all the property and effects of the bank for the creditors. Exchange Bank v. Knox, 19 Gratt. 739.

And where an assignee or trustee accepts the assignment or trust deed, and such deed contains, to his knowledge, on its face, one or more falsehoods on a material point, calculated to deceive and mislead creditors to their injury, he is treated as having notice of his grantor's fraudulent intent, because a falsehood said or done to the injury of the property rights of another is the very essence of fraud. Douglass Merchandise Co. v. Laird, 37 W. Va. 687, 17 S. E. Rep. 188.

Assignee of a Purchase Money Bond.—Assignee of purchase money bonds, secured by vendor's lien, is assignee of a chose in action only and not such purchaser of the land for value as will be protected by Code, 1873, ch. 182, § 8. He is entitled to the rights of his assignor, and no more. Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 694.

4. PURCHASER WITH NOTICE FROM PURCHASER WITHOUT NOTICE.—A purchaser with notice from a purchaser without notice is protected in his title; and the reason is, that if it were otherwise an innocent purchaser might be deprived of the benefit of Selling his estate. Williams v. Lord, 75 Va. 404; Curtis v. Lunn, 6 Munf. 42.

5. PURCHASER OF EQUITABLE TITLE.—The law is well settled that the purchaser of an equitable title can never claim the rights of a bona fide purchaser. The simple fact that his vendor has no legal title is of itself sufficient to give him notice that he is purchasing an imperfect title and to deprive him of the character of a bona fide purchaser and the protection which the law accords to such purchaser. Poe v. Paxton, 26 W. Va. 607; Richards v. Fisher, 8 W. Va. 55; Coles v. Withers, 83 Gratt. 186; Morehead v. Horner, 30 W. Va. 548, 4 S. E. Rep. 448; Stoner v. Harris, 81 Va. 461; Yancey v. Mauck, 15 Gratt. 307; Lowther Oil Co. v. Miller Sibley Oil Co. (W. Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 433.

6. PURCHASER WITHOUT NOTICE FROM PURCHASER WITH NOTICE.—A purchases land with notice of B's equitable right to have a conveyance of the same land, under a prior purchase from their common vendor; and then, A sells the land to C and the vendor makes a conveyance to C, who has no notice of B's equity. Held, C, the first purchaser without notice, shall be protected in equity. Tompkins v. Powell, 6 Leigh 576.

And where the first purchaser has not the legal title, and the subsequent one has paid his money, and has not, indeed, the legal title, but the best right to call for the legal title, before he receives notice, he shall be entitled to priority, notwithstanding he has not actually acquired such title. Lamar v. Hale, 70 Va. 156; Mitchell v. Dawson, 23 W. Va. 86.

Vendor Estopped from Collecting Purchase Money.—A vendor who, after sale to a vendee, sells and conveys to another, without notice to the second purchaser of the first sale, the land sold to the first purchaser, is estopped thereby from collecting by specific performance of the contract from the first purchaser the purchase money for the land to the second purchaser. Core v. Wigner, 32 W. Va. 277, 9 S. E. Rep. 36.

C. MUST BE A COMPLETE PURCHASER.

1. REQUISITES OF A COMPLETE PURCHASER.—

1. Must have paid all the purchase money;
2. Must have received a conveyance of the legal title.
3. Must have been without notice of any outstanding equity or adverse claim. Beverley v. Brooke, 3 Leigh 425; Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 365; Camden v. Harris, 15 W. Va. 563; Cain v. Cox, 23 W. Va. 594; Webb v. Bailey, 41 W. Va. 469, 23 S. E. Rep. 644.

But the strictness of the rule has been much relaxed, and a purchaser for value is now held to be one, who has paid the purchase money and who though, has not received a conveyance of the legal title, has the best right to call for it. South West Va. Va. Mineral Co. v. Chase, 95 Va. 50, 27 S. E. Rep. 826; Pillow v. Southwest Va. Improvement Co., 92 Va. 144, 23 S. E. Rep. 32; Gregory v. Peoples, 80 Va. 355; Lamar v. Hale, 70 Va. 147; Preston v. Nash, 76 Va. 1; Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 365; Mutual Assur. Society v. Stone, 8 Leigh 218; Williamson v. Gordon, 5 Munf. 257; Watson v. Coast, 35 W. Va. 463, 14 S. E. Rep. 249; Marshall v. Hall, 42 W. Va. 641, 26 S. E. Rep. 300.

And the purchaser of a legal title takes it discharged of every trust or equity which does not appear on the face of the conveyance, and of which he has not had notice, either actual or constructive. Evans v. Roanoke Savings Bank, 95 Va. 304, 28 S. E. Rep. 323.

D. ACQUISITION OF LEGAL TITLE.

1. WITHOUT NOTICE OF PRIOR EQUITIES.—It is well settled that a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of a prior equitable right, obtaining the legal estate or title at the time of his purchase, or before he has notice of such prior equity, will be entitled to priority in equity, as well as at law, according to the maxim, "where equities are equal the law shall prevail." Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 397, S. E. Rep. 718; Carter v. Allan, 21 Gratt. 241; Hault v. Donahue, 21 W. Va. 394; Turk v. Skiles, 45 W. Va. 82, 30 S. E. Rep. 234.

And a purchaser of land who has acquired and holds the same by executory contract, duly executed, acknowledged and admitted to record, has from the time it is thus admitted to record a good title against all subsequent creditors and purchasers. Chapter 74, § 4, Code (Ed. 1891), p. 660; Thorn v. Phares, 35 W. Va. 771, 14 S. E. Rep. 399.

Purchaser of Land without Notice of Note Given for Purchase Money in Prior Sale.—A vendor of real estate reserved in the deed of conveyance, a lien for the purchase money to be paid in five years, and a negotiable note was made by the vendee for the amount also payable in five years, but the note was not referred to in the deed. Shortly afterwards the vendor endorsed and transferred the note to a bank in discharge of an antecedent debt. After the note had been so transferred, the same vendor contracted to sell the same property to a third party, who paid the purchase money, and thereupon took from the first vendee a conveyance of the property. The second vendee was wholly ignorant of the existence of the outstanding negotiable note and of any claim on the part of the bank, to the purchase money. Held, that the second vendee took the property unaffected by any lien in favor of the holder of the note. National Valley Bank of Staunton v. Harman, 75 Va. 604.

Without Notice of Prior Attachment.—When one purchases without actual or constructive notice of a prior attachment, and for good consideration, he is a bona fide purchaser, and his title will be good against the world. But, if he have any notice whatever of the prior attachment, he will take in subordination to it. 1 Shinn Attach. § 421; Wap. Attach. § 880; Bowiby v. Dewitt, 47 W. Va. 323, 34 S. E. Rep. 920.

Sale Made by Trustee—Reinvestment.—Where a sale is made by a trustee under power to sell and reinvest upon the same terms, a bona fide purchaser, paying the purchase money to the trustee, will be protected. Claiborne v. Holland, 88 Va. 1046, 14 S. E. Rep. 915.

Purchaser Regarded as Trustee.—When a subsequent purchaser, whether for value or not, whether by deed with covenants of general warranty or of special warranty, whether with or without actual notice or knowledge of the prior purchaser's equitable title by contract executed, duly acknowledged and admitted to record, acquires the legal title, a court of equity regards him and treats him as a trustee, holding the same for the real and true owner, and bound to convey it to such equitable owner when properly requested. Thorn v. Phares, 35 W. Va. 771, 14 S. E. Rep. 405.

And the word subsequent in § 2465, Va. Code 1887, applies to purchasers only. Price v. Wall, 97 Va. 334, 33 S. E. Rep. 599.

Purchaser without Notice of Implied Lien.—In Moore v. Holcome, 3 Leigh 597, it was held that the owner of land who sells and conveys without reserving a lien on the face of the deed, cannot set up his secret implied lien against a subsequent bona fide assignment of bonds, who paid valuable consideration for them. Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 604.

Land Liable in the Hands of the Second Purchaser without notice to the Extent of Unpaid Purchase Money.—"Where the vendee of land still retains the estate is clearly liable for the whole of the unpaid purchase money by virtue of the vendor's lien. Where he has sold to a subvendee, and the title has been made to him, and the money paid before notice of the original vendor's lien, the subvendee holds discharged of that lien. Where, however apart of the purchase money is unpaid by the subvendee, the land in his hands is liable for that unpaid portion, but for no more. The equity is that he shall pay to the original vendor whatever he himself yet owes to his own vendor. If he owes anything, he, and his land are discharged, upon his paying up that to the original vendor's demand; and if he owes nothing, neither himself nor his land is in anywise responsible." Moore v. Holcombe, 3 Leigh 597. See also, Brawley v. Catron, 8 Leigh 522; Mitchell v. Dawson, 23 W. Va. 89.

Purchase without Notice of Right of Way.—Where no private right of way or other easement is reserved in the deed itself, and the purchase has no notice of any such claim, he takes the property without the burden of any such claim, either from the grantor or any person claiming under him. Scott v. Beutel, 23 Gratt. 1; Deacons v. Doyle, 75 Va. 258.

Purchaser from Cotenant.—A purchaser of the common property from a cotenant, with notice of the character of his title, will be limited in his holding to the actual interest of his grantor in the property. Parker v. Brast, 45 W. Va. 399, 32 S. E. Rep. 269.

Purchasers Liable for Annual Encumbrance.—A purchaser, with notice of an annual incumbrance, having prevented the lawful claimant from enjoying the benefit thereof, is personally liable, in equity, to the full value of the land. Blair v. Owles, 1 Munf. 38.

Equity Disclosed by Title Papers.—In Morris v. Terrell, 2 Rand. 6, it was said by the court that "a man who purchased an estate subject to an equity, which the title papers disclose, is bound in the same way as if he had actual notice, although he may never have seen the title papers, and may have been assured by the vendor, and believed that the estate was free from encumbrance. It is folly or wilful neglect not to have resorted to the means palpably in his power of ascertaining the true state of the title to the property for which he had treated." Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 105.

Assignee Not to Be Affected by Latent Equity.—In the case of Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 694, the court, citing and approving Moore v. Holcombe, 3 Leigh 597, held that an assignee cannot be affected by a latent equity in the hands of a third person, of which he has no notice; that the secret implied lien of the vendor was a mere creation of the courts of equity, and could not be used to the injury of third persons who had been misled by the conduct of the original vendor. Stoner v. Harris, 81 Va. 458.

Purchaser with Notice of Trust Holds Subject to It.—If a grantee holding land in trust convey it to a purchaser for a valuable consideration with notice of the trust, it would be enforced in a court of equity against the purchaser. Cain v. Cox, 23 W. Va. 594; Smith v. Proffit, 82 Va. 832, 1 S. E. Rep. 67.

Lien against Policy Holders for Quotas Good against Purchasers without Notice.—By the statutes relative to the mutual assurance society against fire on buildings, and the constitution and rules of the society, the society has a lien of property insured, for all quotas called for under the original act of incorporation of 1794, and for additional premiums upon revaluation and reassurance under the act of 1805, and for all contributions required under the act of 1809 or 1819; and this lien attaches to, and follows, the property in the hands of a subsequent bona fide purchaser without notice of the lien or of the insurance. Mutual Assurance Society v. Stone, 3 Leigh 218.

Where Land Subject to a Charge.—Where land is devised subject to a charge under a will which has been probated, a purchaser of the land, if the charge has not been satisfied, cannot hold it as a purchaser without notice. Burwell v. Fauber, 31 Gratt. 446. See Walters v. Hill, 27 Gratt. 388; Briscoe v. Ashby, 24 Gratt. 454.

Equity of Redemption—Sale to Bona Fide Purchaser.—The husband and wife convey the equity of redemption in land belonging to the wife to a trustee, in trust to sell for the use and benefit of the grantors. Held, the land not having been sold by the trustee, he is not entitled to hold it against a subsequent bona fide mortgage without notice, in satisfaction of debts due to him from the husband, or advances made by him to the husband before the mortgage. McClanachan v. Siter, 2 Gratt. 280.

Bona Fide Mortgagee May Purchase Equity on Claim Originating before Notice.—A bona fide mortgagee of a tract of land, without notice of any equitable lien in the original vendor, (of whom the mortgagor purchased,) is well authorized to purchase of the mortgagor a release of the equity of redemption, (even after notice from the vendor,) in consideration of any just claim of his upon the mortgagor, originating before such notice; but, after notice, the lien attaches, for so much as he may have actually paid, or agreed to pay, for such release, over and above the claims for which the mortgage was taken, and which originated before the notice. Duval v. Bibb, 4 Hen. & M. 113.

Purchaser with Notice of Option.—A third party who, with notice of the equity of the holder of an option, purchased the land from such proposer, takes it subject to the rights of the holder of the option, and holds it in trust for him, and the latter may in equity follow the land into the second purchaser's hands, and compel him to convey the land to him. Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. Rep. 220.

2. PURCHASE WITH NOTICE OF PRIOR SALE.—A party purchasing land who is cognizant of a previous purchase by another takes the place of his vendor, and is liable to the same equity, and bound to do that which his vendor should have done under the contract with such other. Cox v. Cox, 5 W. Va. 335.

Where a vendee of land failed to record his deed, and gave a trust deed which was not recorded, a purchaser without notice from him or from the commissioner authorized to sell his estate acquired all the title he had free from such incumbrance. Hunt v. Wood (Va.), 43 S. E. Rep. 186.

E. WHERE BOTH CLAIMS ARE EQUITABLE.—It may be laid down as a general rule, that between mere equities equal in all other respects, the elder shall prevail. If however the junior claimant shall have an advantage at law, or superior equity, such party shall prevail. Cox v. Romine, 9 Gratt. 37; Williamson v. Gordon, 5 Munf. 257; Coleman v. Cocke, 6 Rand. 618; Mutual Assurance Society v. Stone, 3 Leigh 218; Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 365; Camden v. Harris, 15 W. Va. 563.

Though equitable rights may, in favor of a fair bona fide purchaser, for valuable consideration, and without notice, be lost by a sale, still legal rights never can unless there be a fraud. Hooe v. Pierce, 1 Wash. 312.

F. PURCHASE UNDER MISTAKE OF FACT.—The vendee, to whom, under a mutual mistake of fact, the vendor has conveyed more than was bargained or paid for, cannot be regarded, as to such excess, as a purchaser for value without notice. Massie v. Heiskell, 80 Va. 789.

G. WHERE BOTH CLAIMS ARE LEGAL.

Lien of Judgment Not Effected by Notice.—"The lien of a judgment is a legal lien, and the question of notice has no influence upon it. The purchaser takes the legal title subject to the legal lien, whether a purchaser with or without notice." Taylor v. Spindle, 2 Gratt. 44; Rogers v. McCluer, 4 Gratt. 81; Gordon v. Rixey, 76 Va. 702.

H. WANT OF CAPACITY IN VENDOR.

Sale by Married Woman.—If a deed from husband and wife conveying land of the wife be void as to her because of defective certificate of her examination and acknowledgment, and after the death of her husband she convey the land to another with notice of the former deed, yet the second purchaser will not be affected by such notice, the former deed being void and passing no right, legal or equitable, and the second purchaser does not hold the land as trustee for the first purchaser, and equity will not compel him to convey to the first purchaser, nor will it enjoin the second purchaser from prosecuting an action of ejectment to recover the land from the first purchaser's possession or that of his vendee. Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 32 W. Va. 134, 9 S. E. Rep. 61.

Nor will equity refund to the first purchaser, or his vendee, the consideration paid by the first purchaser by personal decree against the second purchaser, or by charging it on the land. The covenant of warranty in the deed binds the woman no further than to pass her land even if valid. Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 32 W. Va. 134, 9 S. E. Rep. 61.

Purchaser under Void Decree.—A purchaser from a purchaser under a decree void for want of jurisdiction will not be regarded a bona fide purchaser without notice. He is bound to know the want of jurisdiction in the case. Hoback v. Miller, 44 W. Va. 635, 29 S. E. Rep. 1014.

I. PURCHASE OF CONDITIONAL INTEREST.

Where a vendor has a conditional interest and sells, with the knowledge of the vendee, an absolute interest, it was held to be a valid sale. Reeves v. Dickey, 10 Gratt. 138.

J. WHERE PURCHASER ENTITLED TO IMPROVEMENTS.—In order to entitle a purchaser to compensation for improvements it must be shown either that he was at the time he made the improvements a bona fide occupant and holder of the property, or that the improvements were made by him under such circumstances that it would be a fraud upon his rights to permit the owner to take them without compensation. To bring the purchaser within the first class, it must appear that he not only believed he had a good title to the premises and made the improvements in good faith under that belief, but it must be shown that he at the time had reasonable grounds to believe his title good. It is sufficient to defeat his right to compensation if the title under which he claimed appeared upon its face to be defective; in other words he will not be entitled to compensation if he had the means of obtaining information of the defect in his title. Hall v. Hall, 30 W. Va. 779, 5 S. E. Rep. 262.

C bought with notice of infirmity of title, put improvements on the land, and sold it at increased price, and his vendee (H) was evicted as to five-sixteenths. Held C can recover from his vendor only five-sixteenths of the price he received. Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 94; Conrad v. Effinger, 87 Va. 59, 12 S. E. Rep. 2.

K. CONSIDERATION.

Antecedent Debts.—The existence of antecedent debts is a valuable consideration for the conveyance or assignment of property to secure the payment of the debts, and the trustee and creditors are purchasers for a valuable consideration. Western, etc., Co. v. Peytona Cannel Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 409.

Fraudulent Deed Good to Extent It Secures Bona Fide Creditors.—Where a deed is made to hinder, delay and defraud creditors, but which protects some bona fide creditors, it is valid as to them, they being regarded as purchasers for value and without notice under ch. 114, § 1, Code 1873. Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 153; Witz v. Osburn, 83 Va. 227, 2 S. E. Rep. 33.

Voluntary Settlements.—Voluntary settlements though free from actual fraud are void against a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. Cain v. Cox, 23 W. Va. 594.

Liable for Lien Secured by Mortgage.—Land encumbered by a mortgage is liable, in possession of a purchaser with notice, for the sum intended to be secured by the mortgage, but not for other claims of the mortgagee against the mortgagor, especially, if the purchaser has had no notice of the claims. Davidson v. Waite, 2 Munf. 537.

Must Take Subject to Amount of Purchase Money Paid.—One buying from holder of legal title, with constructive notice of trust on the land in favor of one who has partly paid the purchase money, must take subject to that trust. Smith v. Proffitt, 82 Va. 832, 1 S. E. Rep. 67.

Purchaser to Prevail to Extent of Purchase Money Paid.—Where there is a secret lien on land which is sold to a purchaser with notice, who is put in possession and makes payments on it, he should prevail over the secret lienor to the extent of the purchase money paid by him. Cox v. Romine, 9 Gratt. 27.

L. NOTICE.

1. IN GENERAL.—Notice is any knowledge however acquired, which is sufficient to put a party on enquiry; for the law imputes a personal knowledge of a fact, of which the exercise of common prudence and ordinary diligence would have apprised him. If the notice is of this character only, it is called constructive notice, but it is as binding on a purchaser, as if he had actual personal notice of all of which a diligent enquiry would have informed him, if he had knowledge of such facts as would put him upon enquiries. French v. Loyal Land Company, 5 Leigh 627; Wood v. Krebs, 30 Gratt. 715; Lamor v. Hale, 79 Va. 147; Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 397, 2 S. E. Rep. 713; Cain v. Cox, 23 W. Va. 609.

a. Nature and Sufficiency.—To charge a bona fide purchaser with notice, either express or implied, the notice must be something more than a vague statement that the vendor's title is subject to an equity. It must be such information as to bind the conscience of the purchaser. Connell v. Connell, 32 W. Va. 319, 9 S. E. Rep. 252.

And a party will not be considered as having notice unless the circumstances are such that the courts can say, not only that he could have acquired, but that he ought to have acquired the notice but for his gross negligence in the conduct of the transaction in question. McClanahan v. Siter, 2 Gratt. 313; National Valley Bank of Staunton v. Harman, 75 Va. 608.

It is well settled that what is sufficient to put a person of common prudence, ordinary diligence and business experience upon inquiry will charge him with the actual knowledge of the facts of which a diligent pursuit of that inquiry would have informed him. French v. Land Co., 5 Leigh 627, 655; Cain v. Cox, 23 W. Va. 594, 609; Hall v. Hall, 30 W. Va. 779, 5 S. E. Rep. 263; Fouse v. Gillfillan, 45 W. Va. 213, 32 S. E. Rep. 178; Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. 186; Miller v. Holland, 84 Va. 652, 5 S. E. Rep. 701; Pillow v. Southwest Va. Imp. Co., 92 Va. 144, 23 S. E.

Rep. 32; Robinson v. Crenshaw, 84 Va. 348, 5 S. E. Rep. 222; Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 147; Morgan v. Fisher, 83 Va. 417; Lenhart v. Zents, 50 W. Va. 86, 40 S. E. Rep. 444; Keneweg Co. v. Schilansky, 47 W. Va. 287, 34 S. E. Rep. 773.

And the means of obtaining knowledge, with the duty of using them are in equity equivalent to the knowledge itself. Long v. Weller, 29 Gratt. 347; Carneal v. Lynch, 91 Va. 114, 20 S. E. Rep. 959; Eminger v. Hale, 81 Va. 94; Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 147; Shelton v. Ficklin, 32 Gratt. 727; Armentrout v. Gibbons, 30 Gratt. 651; Wood v. Krebs, 30 Gratt. 708; Whitlock v. Johnson, 87 Va. 331; 13 S. E. Rep. 614; Clayton v. Henley, 32 Gratt. 65; Davis v. Tebbs, 81 Va. 60.

b. Constructive Notice.

Nature of Constructive Notice.—Constructive notice is in its nature no more than evidence of notice. The presumption of which is so violent that the court will not even allow of its being controverted. Fouse v. Gilfillan, 45 W. Va. 218, 32 S. E. Rep. 185.

And an illustration of this doctrine of constructive notice is, when the party has possession or knowledge of a deed, under which he claims his title and it recited another deed which shows a title in some other person, then the court will presume him to have notice of the contents of the latter deed, and will not permit him to introduce evidence to disprove it. Fouse v. Gilfillan, 45 W. Va. 218, 32 S. E. Rep. 185.

1. BY POSSESSION.

(a) In General.—Possession of land is evidence that the possessor has the right to the possession that he enjoys. Generally, a person purchasing a tract of land, is presumed to know who has possession of it, and to ascertain the character of the right by virtue of which he holds the possession; or, if the purchaser fails to do so, he is charged with notice of the character of the right, so far as this may be necessary to sustain the possession. But the possession by a stranger to the title sold or conveyed, having no right of possession whatever, is not notice, and does not put a purchaser on inquiry. Western M. etc., Co. v. Peytona C. C. Co., 8 W. Va. 409; Camden v. Harris, 15 W. Va. 564; Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. Rep. 813; Graff v. Castleman, 5 Rand. 195; Wood v. Krebs, 3 Gratt. 708; Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 419, 2 S. E. Rep. 713; Weekly v. Hardesty, 48 W. Va. 39, 35 Rep. S. E. 880; Ellison v. Torpin, 44 W. Va. 414, 30 S. E. Rep. 183; Campbell v. Fetterman, 20 W. Va. 398.

(b) Possession Need Not Be Continuous.—But actual possession need not be continuous and unbroken. The vital question is, was he in possession under a claim of right at the time the lands were conveyed. Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 397, 21 S. E. Rep. 813.

Possession Not Notice to Creditors of Grantor.—Actual possession of land is notice to purchasers of the occupant's right to the land, though his title paper is not recorded, whether the subsequent purchaser actually knows of such occupant's right or not; but such possession is not notice to creditors of the grantor of such occupant of the rights of the occupant, whether the creditors have actual notice of his rights or not. Weekly v. Hardesty, 48 W. Va. 39, 35 S. E. Rep. 880.

Information as to Claim of Tenant in Possession May Be Relied on.—When a purchaser has been put upon inquiry by the possession of a tenant, and upon making such inquiry receives information as to the tenant's claim, he may rely on such information, in the absence of anything to give notice of its falsity. Ellison v. Torpin, 44 W. Va. 414, 30 S. E. Rep. 185.

2. BY INSTRUMENTS RELATING TO TITLE.

Recordation of Deed.—Where a deed is recorded it constitutes notice to all subsequent purchasers of the land, of the interest of the grantees therein, and those claiming under them. Clayton v. Henley, 32 Gratt. 65.

And where a subsequent purchaser has actual notice that the property in question was incumbered or affected, he is charged constructively with notice of all the facts and instruments to the knowledge of which he would have been led by an inquiry into the incumbrance or other circumstance affecting the property of which he had notice. Fidelity Ins. etc., Co. v. Shenandoah Val. R. Co., 33 W. Va. 244, 9 S. E. Rep. 180; Coles v. Withers, 33 Gratt. 186; Lenhart v. Zents, 50 W. Va. 86, 40 S. E. Rep. 444.

A strong case on the question of constructive notice is Armentrout v. Gibbons, 30 Gratt. 632. There a deed reserving a vendor's lien was duly recorded, and afterwards the record of the deed was destroyed. It was held that the constructive notice afforded by the recordation of the deed was equivalent to actual notice of the existence of the lien, notwithstanding the destruction of the records. Eminger v. Hall, 81 Va. 106.

Where a beneficiary in a deed of trust not on record remembers that there was such deed, but cannot find it, it is insufficient as constructive notice to one put on inquiry as to such deed. Roanoke Brick & Lime Co. v. Simmons, 3 Va. Dec. 70.

Subsequent Recorded Deed Inferior to Prior Unrecorded Deed.—Where a deed for land is made to A which is not recorded, if B have knowledge of the deed and especially further knowledge that the land was claimed by, and had been in possession of A for a long time prior to a deed to B from the grantor of A, a deed by the grantor of A to B for the same land, although recorded, vests no title to the land in B. Cosgray v. Core, 2 W. Va. 353.

Vendee Takes All by Deed Unincumbered if without Notice.—Where the deed conveys, without reservation, the grantee takes all conveyed by the deed unincumbered, unless in some way notice is brought home to him that the land is sold subject to the incumbrances of some easement or privilege in another person, or in the public. Deacons v. Doyle, 75 Va. 256.

Plat Filed and Mentioned in Subsequent Deed.—With report of sale was filed a plat of the land sold. Deed for the same, to intermediate purchasers, mentioned that plat. Deed to defendant referred to those deeds. Defendant's agent to examine the title, by the deeds, was referred to the plat and the report of sale, and inspection thereof must have given him notice of the plaintiff's rights therein. Held, the defendant is affected with constructive notice of the outstanding title of the plaintiff. Whitlock v. Johnson, 87 Va. 333, 13 S. E. Rep. 614.

Effect of Acquiescence.—Where those to be affected by the improper delivery and recordation of a deed were fully acquainted with the facts, and acquiesced therein for an unreasonable time, and until the rights of third parties have intervened, they will not be permitted to avoid such deed. Connell v. Connell, 33 W. Va. 319, 9 S. E. Rep. 253.

3. BY SUIT PENDING.—Pendente lite purchasers are charged with notice of all the facts of which the record of the suit would inform them at the date of their purchase. But this is only for the purposes of that suit, and for the benefit of its parties, not for other separate suits or parties. Stout v. Mfg. Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571.

And pendente lite purchasers, after recordation of a notice of lis pendens, where that is required, though not formal parties, are bound by the adjudication touching the property purchased by them, involved in the suit, as if formal parties. Stout v. Mfg. Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571.

4. BY DECLARATIONS AND SILENCE OF OTHERS.

Information from Attorney.—Where a bill was filed to set aside a deed of trust and a sale in pursuance thereof, the defendants claimed to be purchasers without notice, but it was shown by evidence that one of the defendants was told by his attorney that the title was bad, and the other drew a paper settling the property on the grantor's wife and was told by the trustee that the land was owned by the children. So it was held, that the defendants took the property subject to the adverse equities, having had sufficient notice of them. Dugger v. Dugger, 84 Va. 180, 4 S. E. Rep. 171.

Purchaser Bound by Declaration of Grantor.—A purchaser from the grantor, as well as all subsequent vendees, where the trust deed is duly recorded, has no greater rights against the creditor than the grantor himself had, and the title and possession of the one are no greater than the other. The purchaser from the grantor is bound by the acts and declarations of the grantor in respect to the trust while he retains the equity of redemption or any part of it. Camden v. Alkire, 24 W. Va. 675.

Silence of Claimant at Sale by an Adverse Claimant.

—If the owner of real estate, whether he has the legal title in him or not, permit it to be sold, in his presence, by one who claims he has full power and authority to dispose of the same, it thereby becomes his duty to assert his claim then, and if he does not, but stands by and permits an innocent purchaser to buy the land, he is estopped thereafter from claiming the land of an innocent purchaser on the ground that the person of whom he purchased had no authority to sell such land. Stone v. Tyree, 30 W. Va. 687, 5 S. E. Rep. 878.

Declaration by Agent of Adverse Claimant That Arrangements Are Made to Satisfy Claim—Silence of Vendor.—Where land is sold at public auction, and a third person makes a declaration in the hearing of the vendor and the bidders, that he is agent for persons having a claim to part of the land, but that an agreement has been made between him and the vendor, by which the purchaser shall not be injured by the conflicting claims, and the vendor remains silent, he shall be bound by such declaration. Allen v. Winston, 1 Rand. 65.

c. Notice to Trustee.—Where property is conveyed to two or more trustees jointly to secure debts, the estate which they take is joint and inseverable, their title joint and indivisible. Hence, notice to one of the trustees is notice to all. There can be no such thing as a purchase partly bona fide. And notice to a trustee is also notice to his cestui qui trust. Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 398, 21 S. E. Rep. 813; Wickham v. Lewis, 13 Gratt. 430; French v. Loyal Co., 5 Leigh 627; Beverly v. Brooke, 3 Leigh 446; Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Shenandoah Valley R. Co., 33 W. Va. 244, 9 S. E. Rep. 180; Mfg. Co. v. Coal Co., 8 W. Va. 409.

d. Notice before Payment Equivalent to Notice before Contract.—Notice before actual payment of all the money, although it be secured, and the conveyance actually executed, or before the execution of the conveyance, notwithstanding that the money be paid, is equivalent to notice before the contract, and is sufficient to charge lands in the hands of a purchaser with all the claims legal and equitable which third parties may have upon it. Webb v. Bailey, 41 W. Va. 468, 23 S. E. Rep. 646; Blair v. Owles, 1 Munf. 88.

But the rule that a purchaser is bound by notice at any time before he receives a conveyance, does not apply to a lien claimed under a written contract so vague and indefinite as not to designate with any certainty the particular land in question. Lewis v. Madisons, 1 Munf. 308.

M. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

1. PARTIES.—When a party purchases land with notice of an equity in a third party, in a suit by such third party to enforce his equity brought after such purchase, such purchaser is a necessary party, if relief by way of sale of the land is given, unless it appear either that he had notice of the suit pending at the time of his purchase, or that notice of his lis pendens had been recorded under § 13, c. 139, Code 1887, before such purchase. Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. Rep. 220.

One Joining Deed to Relinquish Collateral Need Not Be Party.—In a suit in equity by the claimant of an encumbrance against a vendee, having notice, a person who joined the vendor in the deed, for the purpose of relinquishing a collateral claim need not be a party. Blair v. Owles, 1 Munf. 88.

A Pendente Lite Purchaser Need Not Be Party.—A purchaser of the land from another pendente lite, need not be brought in as a party to the suit. The law imputes notice to such purchaser, for public policy requires that this real property, specifically sued for, shall abide the result of the suit; and such purchaser is as conclusively bound by the decree as if he had been a party from the beginning. Wilfong v. Johnson, 41 W. Va. 233, 23 S. E. Rep. 730.

2. PLEA AND ANSWER.

Necessary Averments.—This defense may be made by plea or by answer. But answer, as well as plea must aver all the essentials of the defense, viz: (1) That they are purchasers for valuable consideration actually paid; (2) that they have received, or are best entitled to receive, conveyance; (3) that their grantor was in possession of the property at the time; and (4) that these facts happened before notice of the adverse claim. But this defense cannot be made unless it is set up by answer or plea. Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 33 Va. 397, 3 S. E. Rep. 713; Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 147; Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh 381; Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Stone, 3 Leigh 218; Hoover v. Donally, 3 Hen. & M. 316; Bowby v. DeWitt, 47 W. Va. 323, 34 S. E. Rep. 919.

And burden of establishing first three essentials rests on alienees; and to affect them with notice of his adverse claims, rests on claimant. Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 147.

Answer Must Deny Notice Though Not Charged in Bill.—In Dowman v. Rust, 6 Rand. 660, CARR, J., said: "A purchaser who claims to be a purchaser for value without notice, must expressly deny notice in his answer, though it is not charged in the bill. This is settled law." And in Tompkins v. Mitchell, 2 Rand. 480, this court laid down the same rule in nearly the same language. Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 33 Va. 397, 2 S. E. Rep. 713.

3. APPEAL.—One not a formal party cannot appeal though affected as a pendente lite purchaser. Stout v. Mfg. Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. Rep. 571.

N. EVIDENCE.

Clerk's Certificate as.—Where the clerk gives a certificate that there is no lien on land, while in fact there is, and which lien is a matter of record, the clerk's certificate will not be taken as conclusive, and the purchasers will be charged with constructive notice. Wood v. Krebbs, 30 Gratt. 708.

Purchasing Agent as Witness.—A purchasing agent is a competent witness to prove that his principal had notice of an incumbrance, notwithstanding such agent joined in a deed conveying the property to the principal free from the claim of any person whatsoever, for the vendor himself may be purchasing for the vendee by his appointment, and the vendee, by constituting him agent makes him a competent witness to prove the notice. Blair v. Owles, 1 Munf. 38.

Burden of Proof.—The burden of proving notice to a purchaser for value is on him who alleges it. It will not be implied from the confidential relation existing between the grantor and the grantee. Snyder v. Grandstaff, 96 Va. 473, 31 S. E. Rep. 447; Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 415, 2 S. E. Rep. 713; Lamar v. Hale, 79 Va. 147; Carter v. Allan, 21 Gratt. 241.

The fact of notice may be inferred from circumstances, as well as proved by direct evidence; and where the facts and circumstances are such as to raise a presumption of notice, the burden of proof is shifted, and it devolves upon the defendant purchaser to prove want of notice. Newman v. Chapman, 2 Rand. 93; French v. Loyal Co., 5 Leigh 635; Farley v. Bateman, 40 W. Va. 540, 22 S. E. Rep. 72.

December, 1828.

Executors—Power Given to Sell Land—Right of Administrator.—C. T. A.—Where Executors are directed by Will to sell lands, and they renounce the Executorship, an Administrator, with the Will annexed, may sell, under the authority given by our Statute, although the Will directs the Executors to sell, "provided the said land will sell for as much as, in their judgment, will be equal to its value." For, the power of the Executors is rather restricted than enlarged by the proviso. It does not vest any peculiar personal confidence in them. The Executors are made Trustees, and within the limit imposed on the exercise of the power, the trust is imperative, and the Executors having renounced, the case falls within the letter and spirit of the Statute.

Executed Contract—Rescission—Ignorance of Law.—The rescission of an executed contract, will not be allowed merely on the ground of an ignorance of Law, where there is neither fraud, concealment, nor mistake in fact.

Decrees—Infant Defendant—Effect.—Although it is a general rule, that an infant Defendant is not bound by a Decree, if, when he arrives of age, he can show error in it, yet, it seems that, where a Decree is obviously for his benefit, his rights may be absolutely bound by it.

This was an appeal from the Chancery Court of Williamsburg, dissolving an Injunction obtained by the Plaintiff, Samuel Brown, against Stark Armistead, Administrator with the Will annexed of David Executors—Power Given to Sell Land—Rights of Administrators.—C. T. A.—On this subject the principal case is cited in Mosby v. Mosby, 9 Gratt. 599; Davis v. Christian, 15 Gratt. 38. In this last case it was held that a power given to executors will survive, though a discretion is given to them in regard to the exercise of the power.

See further, monographic note on "Executors and Administrators" appended to Kosser v. Depriest, 5 Gratt. 6.

†Executed Contract—Rescission—Ignorance of Law.—A mistake in law, when there is no fraud, concealment, nor mistake in fact, constitutes no ground for rescinding a contract. Ferry v. Clarke, 77 Va. 409, citing the principal case to sustain the point. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Shriver v. Garrison, 30 W. Va. 478, 4 S. E. Rep. 672.

See generally, monographic note on "Contracts" appended to Enders v. The Board of Public Works, 1 Gratt. 364.

†Decrees Infant a Party—Effect.—In Harman v. Davis, 30 Gratt. 468, it is said: "Although the infants, were incapable of consenting to the decree, it is binding upon them, if for their benefit—as binding as it would have been if no consent had been given. An infant plaintiff is as much bound by a decree as an adult. Brown v. Armistead, 6 Rand. 594." To the point that infant plaintiffs are as much bound and as little privileged as one of full age, the principal case is cited in Goddin v. Vaughn, 14 Gratt. 123.

See further, monographic note on "Infants" appended to Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Gratt. 505; monographic note on "Decrees" appended to Evaus v. Spurgin, 11 Gratt. 615.

Wright, deceased, and others, and dismissing his Bill. The case is fully stated in the following opinion of the Court.

Leigh, for the Appellant.

Johnson, for the Appellee.

December 17. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.*

In 1813, David Wright made his Will, in which we find the following clause: "My will and desire is that my Executors hereafter appointed sell at public sale all my land, provided the said land will sell for as much, in their judgment, as will be equal to its value and the money arising from such sale be placed in the hands

595 of my friend *Stark Armistead one of my Executors hereafter appointed, who I vest with power to apply the said money to any use or uses he in his discretion may deem best for the benefit of my wife and all my children." The Testator then adds, "In case the land should not be sold on account of its not selling for its value in the judgment" of those in whom he had vested the power to sell, lends a particular part of it to his wife for life. He appointed three Executors, of whom Stark Armistead was one. The Executors all refused to take upon themselves the execution of the Will. The wife relinquished all benefit under it, and qualified as Administratrix, with the Will annexed. She died between three and four years after her qualification; and on the 9th of February, 1818, the same Stark Armistead, who had been appointed Executor, qualified as Administrator de bonis non, with the Will annexed, and three days afterwards, sold the land to Samuel Brown. The Deed, bearing date the 12th of February, 1818, contains a full recital of all the facts on which the authority of the Administrator to sell the land depended. The land was sold for $6,560, payable in three annual instalments, to be secured by bonds, with personal security, and also a Deed of Trust on the land. The contract was carried into complete execution by the vendee's accepting the Deed, taking possession of the land, and sealing and delivering the Deed of Trust and Bonds. In 1823, five years after the execution of the contract, the vendee paid $1,658 of the purchase money, and in April 1824, he filed his Bill, stating that Armistead had no power under the Will to sell the land; that his title is therefore defective, and that he has a right to a Decree, either perfecting it, or if that cannot be done, rescinding the contract, and giving him back his money, with interest, which he prays may be made a lien on the land. He makes Armistead, the Trustee, and the four children of Wright, Defendants. Two of the children are adults, two infants. Armistead and one of the adults are non-residents, and have been 596 properly proceeded against. The Trustee, the other adult, and the infants (by their Guardian,) have answered. The children insist earnestly on the contract; that under the Will, the Law, and the decisions of this Court, the Administrator had full power to sell; that the sale was fair, all the facts being disclosed to the vendee; that it was a very good sale for them, and that the Bill has grown out of the subsequent depreciation in the price of lands. The adult Defendant offers to give any security for the title that can be required. The Chancellor dismissed the Bill. We will enquire in the first place, could the Administrator execute the power of sale given by the Will to the Executors? In the 1st vol. R. C. 388, § 52, it is said, "The sale and conveyance of lands devised to be sold, shall be made by the Executors, or such of them as shall undertake the execution of the Will, if no other person be thereby appointed for that purpose, or if the person so appointed shall refuse to perform the trust, or die before he shall have completed it," (thus stood the Law, as passed in 1785, 12th Stat. at Large, 150; in 1974, was added the rest of the clause, as it now stands in the Revisal of 1819, viz:) "but if none of the Executors named in such Will shall qualify, or, after they have qualified, shall die before the sale and conveyance of such lands, then, in those cases, the sale and conveyance thereof shall be made by such person or persons to whom administration of the Testator's estate, with the Will annexed, shall be granted." This Law as passed in 1785, was taken from 21st H. 8, c. 4. It was admitted in the argument, that if the Testator had directed a positive and unconditional sale of the land by his Executors, the case would have come directly within the Law: but they are directed to sell "provided the land will sell for as much in their judgment as will be equal to its value;" and this, it is insisted, renders it a special confidence reposed in the individuals appointed Executors, which is personal to them; and can only be exercised by them, and not even by a part of them, but by the whole "only. This point was argued with great strength, but the researches of the Counsel had enabled him to produce no cases in support of it; nor have I found any. Without pretending to enter deeply into the doctrine of powers, I may observe that at Common Law they were of two kinds, a naked power, and a power coupled with an interest. Thus, if A. devise his land to his Executors, B., and C. and D., with directions to them to sell it, and hold the money for the benefit of E., this is a power coupled with an interest, because the land being devised to the Executors, the legal estate passes to them. But if A. direct in his Will, that his Executors B., C. and D., sell his land, and hold the money for the benefit of E., this is a naked power, because no estate or interest passes to the Executors. In their construction of these powers, the Courts of Common Law have said, that the first shall be taken liberally, the last strictly; that a naked power given to Executors to sell land, can only be exercised by all the Executors; that, therefore, if one refuse to qualify, or to join in the sale, or die before a sale, no sale can take place. But if lands be devised to Executors to be sold, the power will survive, and such Executors as qualify, or remain alive, may execute the power. This was sacrificing reason and justice to narrow views of strict technical form, for nobody could fail to see, that in each case the intention of the Testator was to turn the land into money, and give that to E., and that in each, equally, the Executors were merely instruments for effectuating such intention. On this ground, Courts of Equity, at an early day, took up the subject, and decided that such naked powers, though extinct at Law, should be enforced in Equity, "rightly deeming, (says Hargrave, in his Note on Coke Littleton, 113, a,) the purpose, for which the Testator directs the money arising from the sale to be applied, to be the substantial part of the devise, and the persons named to execute the power of selling, to be mere Trustees, which brings the case within the general rule of equity; that a trust shall never fail of execution for want of a Trustee, and that if one is wanting, the Court shall execute the office." I apprehend, that the Stat. 21st H. 8, c. 4, was intended to save parties from the delay and expense of resorting to Courts of Equity in such cases, by supplying a Trustee, and such also was the meaning of our Act; and as I think, such should be the spirit in which it is executed. When the question is, whether Equity will assist the execution of a power, by supplying a Trustee, or otherwise, the important enquiry does not seem to be, whether the exercise of the power involves a personal confidence, (for most powers do that in a greater or less degree,) but whether it be a pure and simple power, or a power blended with a trust. In the first case, Equity never interposes; in the last, always. In Toilet v. Toilet, 2 P. Wms. 490, the Master of the Rolls says, "This Court will not help the non-execution of a power, since it is against the nature of a power, which is left to the free will and election of the party whether to execute or not, for which reason Equity will not say he shall execute it, or do that for him which he does not think fit to do for himself." Lord C. J. Wilmot says, (Wilm. 23, cited Sugd. on Powers, 393,) "Powers are never imperative: they leave the act to be done at the will of the party to whom they are given. Trusts are always imperative, and are obligatory on the conscience of the party intrusted." "But sometimes," (says Sugden, in his Treatise on Powers, 393,) "trusts and powers are blended; a man may be invested with a trust to be effected by the execution of a power given to him, which is in that case imperative; and if he refuse to execute it, or die without having executed it, Equity, on the general rule that the trust is the land, will carry the trust into execution. This is the case where a power is given by a Will to Trustees to sell an estate, and apply the money upon trusts. The power is in the nature of a trust." In Harding v. Glyn, 1 Atk. 469, Harding devised certain articles to his wife, "but did desire her at or before her death, to give the same unto and amongst such of his own relations, as she should think most deserving and approve of." Here we see a personal confidence of a very particular kind reposed in the wife. She was to select of his own relations as she thought most worthy. Yet the Master of the Rolls held this to be a trust for the relations, in default of appointment. He said that it operated as a trust in the wife, by way of power of naming and apportioning, and her non-performance of the power should not make the devise void, but the power would devolve on the Court. And this decision is cited by Lord Eldon, as sound Law, in Brown v. Higgs, 8 Ves. 574. In Franklin v. Osgood, 14 Johns. Rep. 554, it is said by Judge, with whom a large majority of the Court agreed, "where a power is coupled with a trust to be executed for the benefit of others, although the power be given in the plural number, and a single Executor does not satisfy the literal expression of the Will, yet the power survives, and a conveyance made in execution of it, is valid."

Let us see how the principle of these cases applies to the case before us. The Testator directs that his Executors shall sell at public sale all his land, provided it will sell for as much, in their judgment, as will be equal to its value, and the money to be placed in the hands of Armistead, one of the Executors, to be applied by him to such use as in his discretion he shall deem most for the benefit of his wife and all his children. What was the chief, indeed the sole purpose, of the Testator? The conversion of his land into money for the benefit of his family. The Executors were the mere instruments for effecting this purpose. Nor do I think that any peculiar personal confidence is reposed in them. They are to sell, if the land will bring what in their judgment is equal to its value. But this, so far from an enlargement, is a restriction of their power. If he had said they should sell the land, without more, they might have sacrificed it. He meant to prevent this, and therefore restrained their power to a sale for a fair price. By appealing to their judgment, as to the value of the land, it cannot be supposed that he meant to submit it to their arbitrary will, and that they might so exercise that will, as to defeat the whole purpose of the power given them. No! they were bound to exercise a sound discretion in the matter, bound to use all proper means to effect a sale; bound to take an advantageous offer for the land, if made to them: they were Trustees to this purpose for the beneficiaries, the wife and children, and if they neglected or abused their trust, a Court of Equity would interpose. Suppose they had been about to sell the land for half its value, would not Equity, on a Bill filed by the wife and children, have restrained them? Suppose double the value had been offered, and they had refused to sell, would not Equity have compelled a sale? I can have no doubt of it. The Executors then, were mere Trustees empowered to sell upon the trusts declared in the Will. Their power was limited in one respect, but within that limit the trust was equally as imperative, as if no such limit had been imposed. The case, therefore, seems to fall directly within the principle of those I have cited, and is clearly, I think, within the letter and the spirit of our Law; for, it is a case where land was devised to be sold by Executors, and they refusing, administration with the Will annexed was granted, and the Administrator has sold and conveyed the land. It was contended in the argument, that the renunciation of the wife defeated the purpose of the trust, and thereby destroyed the power of sale: but, I cannot assent to this. The Testator knew that the wife could, if she please, renounce the Will, but he did not make the power of sale dependent on that. It is to be seen throughout the Will, that the children were the chief objects of the Testator's bounty; for, the provision made for the wife (except a trifle) is by way of loan for her life, while every thing is given to the children. Would it not be strange, then, if the wife, by any movement of her's could destroy a power given principally for the benefit of the children?

By renouncing the Will, she placed herself "upon her legal rights; one of these was a third of the land for life. This might possibly suspend the execution of the power of sale, by preventing the Executors from selling the land for its value, while encumbered with her dower, but it could have no further operation, and we know, that the sale here, was made after her death, and for a full price.

But, another and very conclusive objection to this Bill is, that it seeks to rescind an executed contract, where there has been neither fraud, concealment, nor mistake in fact. The exhibit annexed to the Bill, show that every fact in the case was fully explained and understood, and the sole ground on which a rescission is asked, is ignorance of Law, a conclusion from the facts that the Administrator had a right to sell. I think I have shown that this conclusion was correct; but, suppose it otherwise, that it was founded on a mistake of the Law. "Ignorance of the Law excuses no man." This is among our oldest maxims, and applies even to criminal cases of the highest grade. In truth, it lies at the very foundation of all Law: for, if we suffer the plea of ignorance to excuse a man from the legal consequences of his acts or agreements, that plea must rest wholly on his own assertion, the truth of which, no other evidence could be adduced either to prove or disprove. In executed contracts, it is the general rule that fraud must be charged and proved to authorise a rescission. Mistake of fact, where it is plain, palpable, and affects the very substance of the subject matter of the contract, is sometimes a ground for rescission, but a simple mistake of Law, I think, never. There are certainly some of the elder cases which have given relief, in a few instances, of very gross mistake of Law, and two of them are cited in my remarks on the case of Thompson v. Jackson, 3 Rand. 504; but, the great weight of authority, indeed I believe I might say, all the late cases are to the contrary. For these cases, I refer to the case just mentioned, and also to Pate v. M'Clure, 4 Rand. 164, and Commonwealth v. M'Clanachan's Ex'ors. Id. 482.

There was another subject touched in the argument, on which I will not now give a decided opinion, but my present impressions. The question is, whether a dismissal of the Plaintiff's Bill would not so far bind the infants, as to preclude them hereafter from impeaching the title of the Plaintiff. I incline to think it would. I know very well that the general rule is, that an infant Defendant is not bound by a Decree, if when he arrives at age he can show error in it; and to enable him to do this, he has a day given him, which is generally six months after he comes of age. But, an infant Plaintiff is as much bound by a Decree as an adult. Even an infant Defendant may be bound by a Decree, if made for his benefit. For instance, where a Bill is brought against an infant heir of a mortgagor, the usual course in England (till lately) was to decree a foreclosure, and give the infant a day after his age, (not that he would then be entitled to unravel the accounts, or to redeem the mortgage, but merely to show error in the Decree.) But if, instead of a foreclosure, it was found most for the benefit of the infant to Decree a sale, this might be done by the Court, and such Decree and sale would bind the infant. Booth v. Rich, 1 Vern. 295. So, if lands devised to be sold for payment of debts are Decreed to be sold, the infant has no day after he comes of age, unless he be Decreed to join in the sale. 2 Vern. 429. In Goodier v. Ashton, 18 Ves. 83, there was a Bill to foreclose against an infant heir of a mortgagor. Counsel for the Plaintiff, proposed, instead of a foreclosure, to take a Decree for a sale, as most advantageous for the infant, as was Decreed in the case of Booth v. Rich. Counsel for the Defendant, admitted that a sale would be most beneficial to the infant, and suggested a reference to a Master, to report whether it would not be for the advantage of the infant to have a sale. The Master of the Rolls said, the modern practice had been to foreclose, and unless he could find the case in Ver-

603 non had *been followed since, he would not make the precedent, though he seemed to entertain no doubt of the power of the Court to bind the infant by a sale in such case. In Mondey v. Mondey, 1 Ves. & Beame, 223, the same question came before Lord Eldon. The Counsel prayed a sale, observing that though they could not produce an instance, this might perhaps be done; as the Court had in many respects extended its jurisdiction for the benefit of infants. The Chancellor said, "It would be too much to let an infant be foreclosed; when, if the mortgagee will consent to a sale, a surplus may be got, of perhaps 4,000l. considered as real estate, for the benefit of the infant. If there was no precedent, I would make one: but I am sure this has been done." See also Mills v. Dennis, 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 368. From these cases, it seems not doubted, that a Court of Equity, acting for the benefit of the infant, may bind his rights absolutely by their Decree, though he be a Defendant. And if such doctrine be sound in any case, it would seem to apply very strongly to the case before us. Here, the land was devised to be sold for the benefit of the children, it was sold, and, as the whole case shows, most advantageously sold. The vendee asks to rescind the contract, because he has not, and cannot get a good title. The children, adults and infants, protest against setting the sale aside, asserting that the title is perfect in the vendee. If these children were all of age, there can be no doubt that their Answers and the Decree of the Court, would bind them. It is the privilege of infants, given for their safety and protection, not to be bound generally in such cases, and the Court as their Guardian, is to take care of them; but, to enforce this privilege in the present case, and say, that because the Court cannot bind infants, this contract shall be rescinded, would be to use their shield as a sword to pierce them; for, if the contract be rescinded, the money paid must be returned and made a lien on the land, and I have little doubt, that for the $1,658, which the vendee has paid, he would, on a sale 604 of the land, be *enabled to buy it in; thus ruining the infants under the privilege given for their protection. In such a case it would seem strange, if a Decree at their instance and for their benefit, would not bind them. Suppose, that instead of a Deed of Trust, the vendee had given a Mortgage on the land, and the infants had come in as Plaintiffs to foreclose, asserting the validity of the sale, the goodness of the vendee's title, and praying a Decree for the sale of the land unless the money were paid in a given time; being Plaintiffs, there can be no doubt that a Decree in such a case would bind them, and prevent their ever after impeaching the title of the vendee. But do they not in truth and reason, occupy precisely the same ground here? Having a Deed of Trust, they could proceed in the country to a sale, they have not therefore filed a Bill, but when called into Court to prevent their selling under the Deed, and to rescind the contract, they affirm the contract with all their might, they take their stand upon it, and pray the benefit of it, just as they would have done on a Bill to foreclose a mortgage. From these views, I am strongly inclined to think, that these infants will be so far bound by this Decree, as to be precluded from ever impeaching the Plaintiff's title. Upon every ground, I am for affirming the Decree.

The PRESIDENT, and JUDGES CABELL and COALTER, concurred, and the Decree was affirmed.

pay an augmented price for the land, a parol agreement, varying the written agreement by extending the time within which the search may be continued, (and consequently obliging the purchaser to pay the augmented price,) is within the Statute of Frauds, and will not be enforced by a Court of Equity:

This was an appeal from a Decree of the Court of Chancery for the Richmond District. The case is fully stated in the following opinion of the Court.

Johnson, for the Appellant.
Stanard, for the Appellee.

December 17. JUDGE CARR delivered his opinion.

On the 29th day of July, 1807, Thomas Wooldridge sold to Thompson Blunt, by a contract under the seals of the parties, a tract of land lying in the county of Chesterfield, and containing one hundred and twenty-eight acres, for the sum of $2,000, payable, one half on the 25th December, 1807, the other half on the 25th of December, 1808; and it was further agreed, that Blunt was to commence in the month of July, 1808, to search upon the land for coal, by sinking shafts or boring with bare rods, for the purpose of speedily finding the same, and to continue such search from time to time, as his convenience and the state of the weather will permit, until the 1st of July, 1809, and to be guided in his sinking and boring by the said Wooldridge, or his agent, at his said Blunt's sole expense, and if within the time aforesaid, that is to say, before the 1st of July, 1809, the said Blunt should find a good and sufficient body of coal to work on said land, in that case said Blunt binds himself 606 to pay to said Wooldridge, "or his assigns, $4,000 for said land; that is to say, $2,000 in addition to the bonds already given. In November, 1807, Blunt having sold out his bargain to Henry Heth, gave written directions to Wooldridge to convey the land to him, which was accordingly done. No coal was found within the time stated in the contract. Wooldridge died in 1814. About the middle of July, 1820, Heth found on the land a valuable body of coal. In the early part of the year 1821, Heth died. In April, 1822, this Bill was filed by the Executor of Wooldridge, against the Executor of Heth. It states the written contract, and makes it a part of the Bill. That Heth was a purchaser with full notice, having drawn the agreement: that under the agreement, some slight attempts were made to find coal, but that Heth being very anxious to employ his hands in working other pits, at his instance it was agreed between him and Wooldridge, that the search should be postponed till a more convenient time; and the said Heth agreed, that if at such future time, at which the search should be prosecuted, or at any time, a good and sufficient body of coal to work should be found on said land, the said augmented price of $2,000 should be paid. The Bill then states the subsequent findings of coal, the death of Heth; that by his Will, he subjected his lands to be sold by his Executor; that Randolph qualified, sold the land and became the purchaser; that by the second contract, the augmented price became a charge upon the land; and pays a Decree for the money, and a sale of the land in defect of payment.

The Executor of Heth answered, averring that both Blunt and Heth, being exceedingly anxious to find coal as soon as possible, commenced searching for it immediately after the 29th July, 1807, (before Blunt was required by the contract to do so.) in conformity with the directions of Wooldridge, which search was pushed on, by sinking a shaft, with the utmost vigour, till Christmas, 1807: that in the Spring of 1808, the sinking of the 607 shaft *was resumed by Heth, and pushed on with like energy, till December, 1808, when it was suspended in despair of finding coal there: that several years after, an European Collier of reputation, explored the direction of the coal in the adjoining land, which had been worked for years, and revived the hope that coal might probably be found in the said shaft; that some time after this, the sinking of the shaft was again resumed, and was carried on from time to time, until it was sunk many feet deeper in July, 1820. He positively denies the change of the first agreement by a second, stating many reasons for disbelieving it, and relying on the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries, as a defence. Evidence on both sides was taken, the cause came to a hearing, and the Chancellor decreed, that the additional price be paid, and that unless such payment be made within six months, the land be sold to raise the money. From this Decree the appeal is taken.

The first question respects the Statute of Frauds. "No action shall be brought, whereby to charge any person upon any contract for the sale of lands, tenements and hereditaments, &c., unless the promise or agreement, &c., or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person by him thereunto lawfully authorised." Having in the case of Anthony v. Leftwich, 3 Rand. 238, given my opinion on the general policy of this Statute, and the mischiefs which (in my mind) have followed its relaxation by Courts of Equity, I shall make no further remarks on that subject. With respect to parol agreements for the sale of lands, I believe the Courts have never gone further than to say, that wherever such agreement has been so far executed, that a refusal of full execution would operate a fraud upon a party, and place him in a situation which did not lie in compensation; then a specific execution would be given, provided the contract were clearly established. Before we come to the application of this Statute, we must determine the nature of the 608 contract relied on by the *Plaintiff.

That it is a contract for the sale of land, all must agree. Is it a written or parol contract? Or, is it a written contract, varied by a subsequent parol contract, which the Plaintiff seeks to set up and enforce? The Plaintiff states the written contract for the sale of the land, and makes it a part of his Bill. This is a perfect contract, and as to the claim of the additional $2,000, makes that depend on the finding coal before the 1st of July, 1809;

but, it is most clear, that this additional sum is not claimed by the Bill under this contract: and equally clear, that if it had been, it could not be recovered; for, it is admitted on all hands, that no coal was discovered for eleven years after the time which this contract limits for its discovery. The Bill states, that there was a subsequent agreement as to the time of search for the coal, and the payment of the additional $2,000, but this is neither stated nor proved as an independent agreement; indeed, it would be unintelligible unless connected with the written contract, nor would it be at all less exposed to the operation of the Statute, nor the mischiefs which it was intended to remedy, by taking it as standing by itself. The truth (as it seems to me,) is, that this is a Bill relying on the written contract, to show that by the terms of sale, Blunt was bound to seek for coal twelve months before the 1st July, 1809, and if found in that time, was to pay $2,000 more, and relying on the verbal agreement to show that the parties subsequently changed these terms of the written agreement, Wooldridge agreeing to let Heth off from searching within the time limited, and Heth agreeing that he would resume the search when convenient, and would pay the additional $2,000, if at any time coal should be found. Can a party in Equity enforce a written contract thus varied by parol? The mischief intended to be remedied by this part of the Statute, were the frequent perjuries committed in swearing to parol agreements set up by persons with whom none such had been made. To countervail such proof, (it 609 admitted at all,) *would generally be impossible, because the parties would take care so to fix the time and place of such agreements, as to have no other witnesses present; and then the negative was out of the reach of proof. The Legislature, therefore, thought that the only cure for the evil was to take away entirely, to cut up by the roots, all parol agreements for the sale of lands. Courts of Equity have narrowed this somewhat, by their doctrine of part-performance, but, still, it is settled Law, that a naked parol agreement for the sale of land is void, yea, even if the Defendant, by his Answer, acknowledge the agreement precisely as stated, provided he, at the same time, pleads the Statute. See 2 Bro. Ch. Ca. 564; 1 Bro. Ch. Ca. 416; 4 Ves. 23; 6 Ves. 12; 2 Hen. Bl. 63. Is the attempt to vary this written contract by parol, within the mischiefs of the Statute? Let us look at the circumstances. The written contract was made in 1807; the parties, with great particularity, set down all the terms and conditions of their agreement. Fifteen years after this, and after Wooldridge and Heth were both dead, this Bill is filed, claiming the augmented price of the land, under this parol variation of the contract. How is the new agreement proved? By the testimony of a single witness, (William Wooldridge,) who had been appointed Executor of Wooldridge, the vendor, had qualified, and had afterwards been disqualified, without which he could not have been a witness in the cause. Did he hear the contract made? No! but in the latter part of the year 1808, he met Heth on the road, and Heth, in a casual conversation, told him of the new arrangement between himself and Wooldridge; no other person present. Nor is there another witness who speaks of having heard from any quarter, the slightest intimation of this change of the written contract. The witness gives his evidence in 1824, and speaks from memory solely, of a conversation accidentally held upwards of fifteen years before, a conversation in which he had no interest, to impress it on his memory; and the import of which may have been materially 610 *changed, by a slight misunderstanding in the delivery, or misgiving of memory, in the recollection of it. Nor is there, in the nature of things, any possible check (except the Statute) upon any misstatement of his, whether accidental or wilful. When I speak thus, no one can so far misunderstand me as to suppose that I mean a personal reflection. The witness stands upon the Record perfectly fair in his reputation, and so I take him. But we can make no distinction; for the Law has made none; and I am supported by the Law and the Authorities, when I say that this case presents, in a strong point of view, the very mischiefs which the Statute meant to prevent. These remarks equally apply, whether we consider this as an independent, unconnected, parol contract about the sale of land; or, an attempt to enforce a parol variation of a written contract for the sale of land. The latter, as I have said, strikes me as the true point of view. Many cases might be cited, to show that a written agreement cannot be varied by parol, but the Law is too well settled to require it. I will only cite one, Jordan v. Sawkins, 3 Bro. Ch. Cas. 388; 1 Ves. jr. 402. A lease was agreed by writing to be granted of a house for twenty-one years, to commence from 21st April, 1791, and it was afterwards agreed by parol, that the lease should commence 21st June, instead of 21st April. To a Bill filed by the tenant for a specific performance of the written agreement, varied by the parol agreement, the Statute of Frauds was pleaded, and Lord Thurlow held, that the different period of commencing the lease made a material variation, as it gave the estate from the owner for so many months longer, and therefore he allowed the plea. The variation attempted in the case before us, is of much more importance, it goes to double the price of the land. Is there any such part-performance of this alleged parol contract as will take it out of the Statute? The Books say, that an agreement will not be considered as partly executed, unless the acts done are such as could be done with no other view or design 611 *than to perform the agreement, and if it do not appear, but that the acts done might be done with other views, the agreement will not be taken out of the Statute. The Bill in the case before us, states no such act, nor does the evidence disclose any such. If it be said that the suspension of the search for coal was such act, the answers are, 1st. That this is no act, but merely a forbearance to act; which is laid down to be wholly insufficient: 2dly. The party might suspend the search, because he chose to break his covenant, and answer for such breach at Law; or, 3dly. He might suspend the search, because he considered that he had complied with his contract by searching twelve months, which there is a good deal of evidence to show he might well think he had done. There is, then, no act of part-performance. There were several other points made, of which I take no notice, because the ground on which I have placed the case is perfectly conclusive to my mind, that the Decree should be reversed, and the Bill dismissed.

December, 1838.

Slaves—Importing—Case at Bar.—A son acting for his father, removed with his father's slaves from Maryland to Virginia in March, 1797: bought a farm for his father, and settled the slaves on it. He took the oath, within sixty days, prescribed by the Act of 1792, to be taken by those who remove from another State to this with slaves. The father shortly after removed also, and became a citizen, but did not take the oath.—The Law was complied with, for although the son was not the owner, yet he was the importer, and the agent of the owner. The paupers therefore, who sued for their freedom, adjudged to be slaves.

These cases were all considered together; the first and third were on appeals from the Superior Court of Fauquier; the second on a Supersedeas to a Judgment of the same Court.

In the first case, the Plaintiff, Jonas Montgomery, a negro man, brought his suit in forma pauperis, to recover his freedom from Robert Fletcher, the Defendant, who held him as a slave. At the trial in July, 1826, the Plaintiff excepted to an opinion of the Court. The Bill of Exceptions states, that the Plaintiff proved that Robert Whiteford, a citizen and inhabitant of the State of Maryland, intending to remove thence with his family and slaves, and to become a citizen of this Commonwealth, in the month of March, 1797, sent his son, Hugh Whiteford, to the County of Fauquier, in this State, and sent with him from Maryland to the said County, sundry slaves, the property of the said Robert Whiteford, amongst whom was the Plaintiff, who was then about nine or ten years old: that the said Hugh Whiteford, who also removed to Virginia with an intention of remaining, and has ever since remained therein; purchased a farm for the said Robert Whiteford, in the County aforesaid, and settled the said slaves upon it, and managed the farm and slaves as the agent of the said Robert Whiteford, who in pursuance of his said original design, 613 himself removed *from the State of Maryland to the said farm in the month of August, 1797, and resided upon and held the same, and the said slaves until his death, which happened about 1804. The Defendant proved, that the said Hugh Whiteford, within sixty days after his said removal, and bringing with him the said slaves, took the oath, in due form, which was prescribed by Law to be taken by persons intending to remove from any of the United States, and to become citizens of this Commonwealth, and importing slaves, which oath was taken before a Justice of the Peace for the County of Fauquier. The Defendant also proved, that after the death of the said Robert Whiteford, in 1805, the Plaintiff was sold as a slave by the legal representative of said Robert, to the Defendant, who has ever since held him as a slave; and thereupon the Defendant, by his Counsel, moved the Court to instruct the Jury, that if they were satisfied of the truth of the foregoing facts, the oath so as aforesaid taken by the said Hugh Whiteford, was a compliance with the requisition of the Act of Assembly, so as to prevent a right to freedom from accruing to the Plaintiff, by his being so imported into this Commonwealth, and that it was necessary for the said Robert Whiteford, upon his said removal, to take the said oath, to prevent the right to freedom accruing to the Plaintiff, which instruction the Court gave, and the Plaintiff excepted. There was a verdict and judgment for the Defendant, and the Plaintiff appealed.

In the second case, Benjamin Smith, a negro man, a son of Fanny Smith, brought his suit in forma pauperis, against Mary Whiteford, to recover his freedom. At the trial, before another Judge, in November, 1826, who then held the Superior Court in Fauquier, the same instruction was moved for by the Defendant as in the first case, and the same facts proved, except, that in this case, the mother of the Plaintiff was brought in by Hugh Whiteford, the Plaintiff being born after the introduction of his 614 mother *into this State, and the certificate of the Justice before whom the oath was taken, was produced. The Justice certifies that, "Hugh Whiteford, who had just removed from the State of Maryland, into this Commonwealth, and into this (Fauquier) County, the following slaves, viz: Fanny, Jonas, and Jack, took the oath prescribed by Law to prevent the further importation of slaves." The Judge differing in opinion from the Judge who tried the other case, refused the instruction, and there was a verdict and judgment for the Plaintiff.

Leigh, of Counsel for Mary Whiteford, in the petition for a Supersedeas, stated, that Hugh Whiteford was the actual importer: that in the case of M'Michen v. Amos, 4 Rand. 134, the wife of the importer of the slaves took the oath, and that was held not to be a compliance with the Act of 1792. Here the actual importer took the oath, though the slaves imported belonged to his father: if the importer was not the proper person to take the oath, then, though the importation was clearly legal under the circumstances, no person could take the oath, for the owner could not, as he was not also the importer. The Supersedeas was awarded.

In the third case, the action was brought by Fanny Smith, and her daughters Eleanor and Harriet, who, in forma pauperis sued William B. Cordell, to recover their freedom. This suit was tried at the same Court at which the second case was tried. The Defendant demurred to the evidence of the Plaintiffs: that evidence proved the same facts as are set out in the other two cases as to the importation, and the oath taken by Hugh Whiteford. In addition thereto, there was evidence to prove that these Plaintiffs were sold at Robert Whiteford's sale to one Israel Johnson who agreed to take $300 for them from the Plaintiff, Fanny Smith, who, on the payment thereof, was to be free, as well as her children; but he made a Bill of Sale of them to one Thomas Chapple, who had as-615 sisted *her with a part of the money: that Chapple permitted them to act as free persons for ten years, but that a part of the money being still due to him, he at length, in 1825, sold them to the Defendant as slaves. They were never legally emancipated either by Johnson or Chapple.

A verdict was found for the Plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the Court on the demurrer to evidence, and the Superior Court as above mentioned, gave Judgment for their freedom. The Defendant appealed.

The Act of Assembly on which this question turns, is to be found in the Revised Code of 1792, ch. 103. The second section of that Act declares, that "slaves which shall hereafter be brought into this Commonwealth, and kept therein one whole year together, &c. shall be free." Sec. 4: "Provided, that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to extend to those who may incline to remove from any of the United States, and become citizens of this, if, within sixty days after such removal, he or she shall take the following oath before some Justice of the Peace of this Commonwealth: I, A. B., do swear, that my removal into the State of Virginia, was with no intent of evading the Laws for preventing the further importation of slaves, nor have I brought with me any slaves with an intention of selling them, nor have any of the slaves which I have brought with me been imported from Africa, or any of the West India islands, since the first day of November, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight. So help me God."

616 *December 17. The PRESIDENT delivered his opinion.

Passing by some minor points, which it is not material to notice, these cases will turn on the following facts: Hugh Whiteford, as agent of his father, the owner of the slaves whose freedom is in question, who then, and ever afterwards managed the affairs of his father, came from Maryland to Virginia, purchased for his father a farm, to which, in the Spring of 1797, he removed with the slaves, and before he was followed by his father, which happened soon after, went before a Magistrate and within the sixty days took the oath prescribed by the Act concerning slaves, &c.; and the question is now raised, after the lapse of more than thirty years, whether he was competent to take that oath, he not being the absolute owner of the slaves: and the case of M'Michen v. Amos, 4 Rand. 134, is relied on as having decided it in favor of the slaves. In that case there was no distinction taken between the proprietor of the slave and the person bringing him into the State. The only question submitted by the Jury was, whether the husband, being the owner and importer, the wife was competent to take the oath, and the decision was, that the person bringing the slave into the State was alone competent to take the oath, which was entirely consistent with the Act, which does not advert to the owner, either in the clause imposing the penalties, in that giving freedom, or in that prescribing the oath. Nor can a contrary decision be implied from the opinion of the Judge in the first of the cases now before us. The son, (who was the agent of the father,) and the father, were the importers of the slaves. Both intended to become, and did become citizens of Virginia, by which the Law was satisfied, its policy being to exclude slaves generally, but to admit them when brought by persons removing from another State and becoming citizens. Either the son or the father might take the oath. Being taken by the son, it was sufficient, within the letter and spirit of the Act. It is best to lay down no general rule in these 617 cases. Where *the Act has been substantially obeyed, and its policy advanced, it cannot be decided to be violated, and heavy penalties inflicted, upon nice distinctions drawn in supposed cases.

In the first case, in which the instruction of the Judge to the Jury was proper, the Judgment is to be affirmed. In the case of Cordell v. Smith, the Judgment is to be reversed, and Judgment rendered for the Defendant; and in the case of Whiteford v. Smith, the Judgment is to be reversed, and a new trial awarded, on which, the instruction which was asked for by the Defendant is to be given, if again required.

All the other Judges concurred.

*Coleman v. Cocke.

December, 1828.

Execution*—Returned Satisfied in Part—Right of Creditor.—According to the equitable and correct construction of our Statute concerning Executions, (section 8d.) if a creditor, by Judgment or Decree, sues out a F. Fa. which is levied, and returned satisfied in part only, he may take out another kind of Execution, as the Elegit, without pursuing the F. Fa. to a return of Nihil.

Fraudulent Conveyance*—By Debtor to Son—Setting Aside—Case at Bar.—Conveyances from a father, who is in debt, to his sons, without any valuable consideration, declared to be grossly fraudulent, and decreed to be set aside at the suit of the creditors of the father, who obtained their Decrees long after the execution of the Deed.

Same*—Same—Same—Same.—If a father purchase lands, and direct the conveyance to be made to his child, the conveyance may be impeached for fraud by a creditor of the father. Therefore.

*Executions.—On this subject, see monographic note on "Executions" appended to Paine v. Tutwiler, 37 Gratt. 440.

See principal case cited in M'Cullough v. Sommerville, 8 Leigh 484; Findlay v. Toncray, 3 Rob. 578; Taylor v. Spindle, 2 Gratt. 67.

†Fraudulent Conveyances.—See full discussion of this subject in monographic note on "Fraudulent where a father, B., purchased two tracts of land of C., under an agreement that the legal title should be withheld till the purchase money be secured, or paid, and the father held the possession as real beneficial owner for several years, and then being in debt, directed the vendor of the land, C., to convey to his son, W., which was done, and gave possession to his said son, no valuable consideration having passed from the son, either to his father, or the vendor, and then directed his said son to convey and deliver a part of the said land to another son, P., which was done, no valuable consideration passing, these conveyances decided to be fraudulent and void, and decreed to be set aside, and the lands to be sold, at the suit of the creditors of the father.

Same-Same-Rights of Purchaser from Son.—Although if a son obtain a conveyance for land purchased by his father, that conveyance may be set aside for fraud by a creditor of the father, whilst the land is in the hands of the son; yet, if the son sell and convey the land to a third person for valuable consideration, who has no notice of the fraud between father and son, such third person being a bona fide purchaser, will be protected in his purchase against the creditors of the father, from the operation of the Statute of Frauds, by its proviso.

Same-Same-Same-Priority over Judgment—Creditor of Grantor.—And if the Deed of such bona fide purchaser be not duly recorded, yet he will be protected in his purchase against a creditor of the father, who obtains a Decree against the father, after the bona fide purchase so made, because such a purchaser has a prior equity to such creditor. For, if the original vendor had never made a Deed to the son, yet the purchaser, holding the equitable title transferred from the father to the son, and from the son to him, would have had a better right to call on the original vendor for a conveyance of the legal title, than any creditor of the father obtaining a Judgment against him, after his transfer of the equitable right to the son.

Decrees—Two Decrees against Defendant on Same Day—Effect.—If there be two Decrees on the same day against a Defendant's land, the whole, and not a moiety only of the land, ought to be directed to be sold; for, at Law, each of two Judgments would have taken a moiety of the land, and both of course the whole, if it had been extendible at Law.

This was an appeal taken by Henry E. Coleman and William A. Bentley, from a Decree rendered against them 619 *and others, by the Superior Court of Chancery for the Richmond District.

The Bill was exhibited in February, 1820, by John F. Cocke, and Anne, his wife, who was Anne Ronald, and Elizabeth Ronald; and sets forth, that William Bentley, in the year 1793, together with Samuel Pleasants and John Swann, qualified as Guardians of the female Plaintiffs, and of their sister, Jane Ronald, and executed a Guardian's Bond, with four sureties, (nam-and Voluntary Conveyances" appended to Cochrane v. Paris, 11 Gratt. 348.

The principal case is cited on the point in Taylor v. Spindle, 2 Gratt. 57; Dold v. Geiker, 2 Gratt. 102; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 415; Lockbar v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 96.

[Real Estate—Priority—Equitable Interest—Legal Title.]—In Delaplain v. Wilkinson, 17 W. Va. 267, it is said: "It seems that it has long been an established rule of courts of equity, that, apart from any positive provision of a statute to the contrary, where one has an equitable interest in land with a good right to call for the conveyance of the legal title, and a subsequent encumbrancer (i. e. a judgment creditor) whose debt did not originally affect the lands, acquires the legal title, he shall notwithstanding be postponed to the equitable claimant. For since the subsequent encumbrancer did not originally take the land for his security, nor had in his view an intention to affect it, when afterwards the land is affected by his lien, and he comes in claiming under the very person who is obliged in conscience to make the assurance good, he stands in that person's place and is postponed, despite his legal title, to the superior equity of the adverse claimant." 2 Lom. Dig. 487; Burgh v. Francis, 1 P. Wms. 279; Withers v. Carter, 4 Gratt. 411; Coleman v. Cocke, 6 Rand 618; 2 Min. Inst. 873, 874."

ing them;) that the sister, Jane, died some time afterwards, under age and unmarried, leaving the female Plaintiffs her heirs: that Pleasants and Swann were merely passive, and that William Bentley took possession of the lands, slaves, and other personal property of the Plaintiffs, and received the rents, issues and profits thereof, till August, 1806, when the Plaintiff, Elizabeth, made choice of Samuel Pleasants as her Guardian, and Anne, of John Swann as hers: that Bentley, having disposed of, and dissipated a great deal of property of the female Plaintiffs, their new Guardians sued Bentley, to compel him to account, and to restrain him from wasting the estate, and the Superior Court of Chancery, finally, on the 19th February, 1819, Decreed, that the said Bentley should pay each of the Plaintiffs, his former Wards, (who had then come of age,) the sum of $6,621 62, and their joint costs, amounting to $337 99: that the Plaintiffs sued out their Executions against the said Defendant's goods, by which the costs were made, and the sum of $91 86 for each of the Plaintiffs, and "no effects," returned as the residue.

The Bill states, that the said William Bentley, early in 1805, purchased of William A. Cocke a tract of land in Halifax County, containing one thousand and fifty-seven acres, for the sum of 1,800l., and in 1806, purchased of James Cocke another tract of land and ferry in the same County, for 1,200l., and paid the full amount of the purchase money to the Messrs. Cockes; that at the former period, the said Bentley was indebted to the Plaintiffs 620 *in more than $12,000, and at the latter period, more than $14,000, according to the report made in the before-mentioned cause: that no Deed was made of the said tracts of land to the said Bentley, but that by his desire, William A. Cocke conveyed, in August, 1805, the first mentioned tract to William A. Bentley, a son of the said William Bentley; and by the same request, James Cocke conveyed, in 1806, the second tract to the same William A. Bentley: that no consideration passed from William A. Bentley to either James or William A. Cocke, and the Bill expressly charges, that William Bentley voluntarily, gratuitously and fraudulently caused the conveyances to be so made to his said son: that the said William A. Bentley, in May, 1807, conveyed, by the direction of his father six hundred acres of the first mentioned tract to Peter E. Bentley, a brother of the said William A. Bentley, for the consideration of $1; and the Bill charges fraud also in this transaction.

The Plaintiffs further aver, that the said William Bentley made, in August, 1807, a fraudulent conveyance to his son, John W. Bentley, of a tract of land in Powhatan County, of three hundred and ninety acres, with sixteen slaves and other property, and that no valuable consideration passed for the same: that in April, 1808, he fraudulently conveyed another tract in Powhatan, on which he then lived, containing eight hundred acres, together with two negroes, a carriage, his horses and stocks of all kinds, plantation utensils and house hold furniture, including plate and kitchen furniture, to the same son, John W. Bentley, who gave no valuable consideration for the same: that John W. Bentley died in 1814, having devised his land and other property to his sister, Judith, and brother, Henry Bentley; and that his brother, Joseph R. Bentley, administered on his estate: that the said William Bentley also conveyed, fraudulently to his son, Joseph R. Bentley, a tract of land in Halifax, and another in Harrison County, together with sundry slaves, and other property, the son paying no valuable consideration for the same.

621 *When these conveyances were thus made to the two sons, John and Joseph, the father was still more largely indebted to the Plaintiffs.

The Plaintiffs further state in their Bill, that in July, 1813, the said Peter E. Bentley conveyed to Henry E. Coleman, for the consideration of $6,243, five hundred and twenty acres of land, part of the said tract which had been conveyed to him by the said William A. Bentley, in May, 1807; and they expressly charge, that the said Coleman was cognizant, at the time of his purchase, of the fact, that the said tract was part of that which had been fraudulently conveyed, by direction of the father, by the one son to the other, and of the fact that the said William Bentley was largely indebted to the Plaintiffs, and as a proof of the fact, they refer to a Deed, bearing date 28th October, 1815, from the said William Bentley and Wife to the said Coleman.

They state, that in June, 1807, the said William Bentley, under the pretext of indemnifying the sureties for his administration, on the estate of William Ronald, conveyed to certain Trustees, two tracts of land in Powhatan, one of them containing four hundred and twenty acres, the other eight hundred, being the same conveyed afterwards to John W. Bentley, as above-mentioned: that the said William Bentley had fully administered the estate of William Ronald as early as 1794, when a balance was found in his favor of more than 9851. due to him from the estate, and that this pretended Trust Deed was not made till 1807, when the sureties in the Administration Bond were in no manner of danger, but the said William Bentley, as Guardian, was indebted to the Plaintiffs in the above-mentioned large sums, and they therefore charge, that the said Deed of Trust was executed for the express purpose of defrauding them.

They state, that after the above mentioned voluntary and fraudulent conveyances were made, and during the pendency of the suit brought by their Guardians against the said Bentley, that is, on 622 the 26th September, 1811, he *the said William Bentley, took the oath of an insolvent debtor.

They pray that the said William Bentley, and his sons, William A., Peter E., Joseph R., and Henry Bentley, and his daughter, Judith Bentley, and the representatives of his deceased son, John W. Bentley, and the said Henry E. Coleman, may be made parties Defendants to their Bill: also, that the Trustees for the sureties of William Bentley's administration on the estate of William Ronald, and the surviving sureties, and the representatives of the deceased sureties of William Bentley, as Administrator of William Ronald, and the representatives of the deceased sureties of William Bentley's guardianship of the Plaintiffs, (all by name,) should be made parties Defendants.

They pray that the Defendants to whom the voluntary and fraudulent conveyances aforesaid have been made, may account with them for the same, and may release to them the legal titles: that the property, real and personal, conveyed to the sons, be declared a trust for the Plaintiffs, and sold by a Decree of the Court: that the Trustees for the sureties of Bentley release the property conveyed to them, or that the property be declared a trust for the Plaintiffs, after the sureties are indemnified: that the representatives of the sureties in the Guardian's Bond be required to pay the penalty of the Bond, and that the Defendant Coleman be declared a purchaser with notice, and the land purchased by him be subjected to the just claims of the Plaintiffs, and for general relief.

The Deeds and other documents referred to in support of the Plaintiffs' Bill are correctly recited therein, except perhaps the Deed from William Bentley and Wife to Coleman, in 1815. That Deed recites that William Bentley had purchased the land in Halifax from William A. Cocke, previous to his intermarriage with his present wife, (she being the second,) but that he had given it to his sons, Wm. A. and Peter E., and that the conveyance was made by William A. Cocke to his son William 623 A. Bentley, *and by him to his son Peter E. after his intermarriage: that Peter E. had conveyed to Coleman, and that doubts had been entertained whether his said wife was entitled to dower in that land; to remove that doubt, and to relinquish such supposed dower right, the Deed is declared to be made.

The Deed from Peter E. Bentley to Henry E. Coleman, bears date 10th May, 1813; it is a Deed of bargain and sale, in the usual form, expressing the consideration paid by the grantee to the grantor, and with general warranty. It does not show on its face how Peter E. Bentley, the grantor, derived his title. The Deed is attested by five witnesses, was proved in the County Court of Halifax, on the 24th May, 1813, by two witnesses, which was ordered to be certified, but it does not appear to have been ever proved by any other witnesses, and was therefore not recorded.

Amongst the documents referred to by the Bill, are three Executions of Fi. Fa., consequent on the Decrees rendered in the suit of the Guardians of the female Plaintiffs, which suit was in process of time carried on by the Plaintiffs themselves, they having come of age. One of the Executions was in behalf of Elizabeth Ronald, against William Bentley's goods and chattels, for $6,621 62, with interest from 30th January, 1811, till paid; another in behalf of John F. Cocke and Anne his wife, against the same Defendant, for the same sum; and the third in behalf of all of the said Plaintiffs against the same Defendant for $337 99, which had been Decreed to them for their joint costs. All of the Executions bore date 8th March, 1819, returnable to the first day of the next Term, and were levied by the Marshal on three slaves, the proceeds of the sales of which were applied first to the discharge of the Execution for costs, and the surplus divided and applied equally to the other two, on each of which was made the sum of $91 86. The Marshall does not return "nulla bona," as to the residue of 624 the money "decreeed to the Plaintiffs, nor does it appear from the Record that any other Execution was sued out under that Decree. This suit was shortly afterwards brought.

So much for the Bill, and its exhibits.

The Defendant William A. Bentley, answered, saying that in 1805 or '06, a verbal contract was made between his father and himself, by which he was to purchase, and receive from his father, a tract of land, for which his father had paid a full and valuable consideration: that as some difficulty was expected in the relinquishment of dower by his father's wife, it was agreed that the Messrs. Cockes should convey directly to the Defendant, and that the Defendant should convey six hundred acres to his brother Peter: that several exchanges having been made between the Defendant and his brothers Peter and Joseph, he now retains about fifty acres of that six hundred acre tract, for which he has paid a valuable consideration to Joseph. He argues, that if no valuable consideration had passed, that blood alone, from a father in prosperous circumstances, to a son just commencing life, would be entitled to some respect, and that the creditors of William Bentley could not disturb his title, so long as there was other property unprotected by such an equity; but he avers that for the five hundred and seven acres which he holds, he bound himself to pay his father 1,000l., in annual instalments, beginning in 1808, and that he has paid that sum, the last in 1812. [He supports this allegation by the deposition of one Armistead Martin, who proves that he saw the Defendant pay his father 200l. in each of the years 1808-9-10; and by the deposition of John Peck, who proves that he saw him pay his father 200l. in 1812, and that William Bentley said that it was the last instalment.] The Defendant further says, that since 1812, he has made sundry advances to his father, and to others for him, but has rarely retained the vouchers, knowing there would be no occasion for them between himself and his father: that he has recently paid 262l. 10 4, as a surety for his father, under an 625 Execution "issued by Ellis & Allan.

[This allegation is supported by the deposition of the Deputy Sheriff.] He concludes that he has thus paid a full and valuable consideration for the land, and prays that the Bill may be dismissed as to him.

The Defendant, Henry E. Coleman, answers, and says that he purchased of Peter

E. Bentley, a tract of land in Halifax, containing five hundred and twenty-one acres, for $6,243, which he has long since paid for. At the time of the purchase he knew that the said tract was part of that conveyed by William A. Cocke to William A. Bentley, but he has no recollection that he knew the fact, that William Bentley had purchased and paid for the land, and desired Cocke to convey to William A. Bentley. That Peter E. Bentley had been in possession of the land for several years, and the Defendant denies that at any time before the transaction was closed by the payment of the purchase money to the said Peter, he the Defendant had any notice whatever, that William Bentley was indebted to the Plaintiffs, or others, or that he had procured the said land to be conveyed to the said William A. Bentley, for the purpose of defrauding the Plaintiffs, or any other creditor, or creditors. With respect to the Deed to him from William Bentley and Wife, in 1815, he says, that after he had paid to Peter Bentley about two thirds of the purchase money, he was informed that the wife of William Bentley would set up a claim of dower, and required a release of that interest, and the Deed was executed for that purpose alone. He relies for this protection, on his own equitable and legal title, obtained from Peter E. Bentley, without notice of the claim of the Plaintiffs, fortified by the Deed from William Bentley and Wife, made before the Plaintiffs obtained any Judgment or Decree against the said William Bentley, which could have given them a lien on any land which the latter might have owned.

626 "Several of the representatives of the sureties for the Administration of William Ronald's estate answered, but it is not necessary to notice those Answers.

The deposition of William A. Cocke was taken. He proves that in 1796, or '97, he sold to William Bentley a tract of land in Halifax of one thousand one hundred acres and more, for which the said William Bentley alone paid him, and he made the Deeds in 1805, to William A. Bentley, at the request of his father. He denies that, at the time of the purchase, William Bentley declared he was purchasing for his son, and would not ask for a Deed till he came of age: the Deed was not to be made till the purchase money was secured, but it was made sooner. The whole money was, however, afterwards paid.

James Cocke deposed, that about the year 1800, he exchanged his land, containing one hundred and fifty four acres, at Bibb's ferry, in Halifax, valued at 1,000l., with William Bentley, for a tract of eight hundred acres, in Amelia, valued at $7 50 per acre: the deponent made the Deed in 1806, by request of William Bentley, to his son William A. Bentley, for the purpose, as Bentley said, of saving the expense of record in two Deeds. The deponent paid the difference to William Bentley, or to his orders, transmitted by his son William A. Bentley.

There were two other depositions taken by the Plaintiffs, to invalidate the evidence of Armistead Martin and John Peck, the two witnesses adduced by William A. Bentley to prove the payment of 1,000l. to his father in several years from 1808 to 1812.

The Chancellor pronounced an interlocutory Decree on the 24th June, 1826; in which, after reciting the Decree rendered in 1819, in behalf of the present Plaintiffs, against William Bentley and others, and stating that Executions had issued, and that they had produced only a small part of the sums Decreed, he says, that "It also appears to the Court, that while the said William Bentley was largely indebted to his

Wards, he, by several voluntary
627 Deeds, "conveyed, or caused to be conveyed to his sons, the whole, or nearly the whole, of his estate, real and personal, and afterwards took the oath of an insolvent debtor." He then specifies those Deeds, viz., the Deeds from William A. Cocke and James Cocke, to William A. Bentley; from William A. to Peter E. Bentley; the two Deeds from William Bentley to his son, John W.; and from the said William Bentley to his son, Joseph. He then proceeds: "It also appears to the Court, that the said Peter E. Bentley sold and conveyed to the Defendant, Henry E. Coleman, five hundred and twenty acres, part of the said land in Halifax, purchased as aforesaid from the said William A. Cocke. This purchase and conveyance were made pending the suit in this Court, in which the Decree aforesaid was rendered; and on the face of the conveyance it appears, that the Defendant, Coleman, had notice of the manner in which the said Peter E. Bentley acquired his title to the lands aforesaid. The said Coleman, to confirm his title thus acquired, took a Deed of Release from the said William Bentley and Wife in October, 1815." The Decree then states, that it does not appear that the Deeds for the lands in Halifax had ever been recorded, and that it was admitted "by the Defendant's Counsel, that the said Deeds were not otherwise recorded, than appears by the certificates of the Clerk, though he insisted, that as the legal title to the said land had never been in the said William Bentley, the recording of the said Deeds was not necessary to their validity. Upon the facts above stated, and upon the proof in the cause, the Court is of opinion, that all the aforesaid Deeds to the sons of William Bentley, were voluntary, fraudulent and void, as to the Plaintiffs, the creditors of said William Bentley; and that the whole of the property, real and personal, conveyed by them, is liable to be sold in satisfaction of the debts due to the Plaintiffs. The Court is also satisfied, that the Deed to the Defendant, Coleman, does not prevent the property thereby conveyed to him,
628 from being subjected to "the Plaintiffs' claim; but, as he is a purchaser for valuable consideration, the Court will not subject his property to sale, until it shall be ascertained whether the Plaintiffs' debt can be satisfied from the other property within the reach of the Court."

The question arising on the Deed to the Trustees for indemnifying the sureties to the administration on William Ronald's estate, are deferred till the final hearing; and in the mean time, the property so conveyed will be brought into market, and the proceeds held subject to the future order of the Court. The question as to the liability of the sureties of William Bentley as Guardian, is also deferred.

The Decree then directs, that unless the Defendants, or some of them, shall pay to the Plaintiffs the sums respectively due to them, the Defendants do surrender the whole of the property, real and personal, included in the Deeds aforesaid, to the Marshals, who are directed to sell the same on the terms specified: but, the Marshal is ordered not to require a surrender of the land held by the Defendant, Coleman, nor to proceed to sell the same, unless the proceeds of the other property surrendered under the Decree, shall be insufficient to satisfy the debt and interest due to the Plaintiffs.

From this Decree the Defendants, Coleman and William A. Bentley, appealed.

Leigh, for the Appellants.

Johnson and Stanard, for the Appellees.

December 17. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion.

The Appellees having obtained Decrees against William Bentley, filed their Bill against him, and many persons holding personal, and others holding real property, some of them directly, and others indirectly, under him, the object of which was to set aside the conveyances as being 629 "fraudulent as to them, and to subject the property, thereby conveyed, to the satisfaction of their claims.

The Counsel for Coleman, who holds a part of the land in question, urged as an objection to the jurisdiction of the Court, that at the time when the Bill was filed, the Plaintiffs had not a capacity to sue out Elegits on their Decrees, without taking some further preliminary step to enable them to do so, and consequently had not then a subsisting lien on their debtor's land, that not being the effect of a Judgment only per se, but of the capacity to extend it by Elegit, and that a creditor at large, having no lien on his debtor's land, cannot claim the aid of a Court of Equity, in order to enable him to reach it by removing impediments to his proceedings at Law. This objection, if well founded, would lead to the dismissal of the Bill as to the relief sought, in respect to all the lands mentioned in it.

The objection is founded on the decision of this Court in Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call, 125, and a recent decision of C. J. Marshall, to the same effect, in which it was held, that a judgment creditor could not overreach in Equity a bona fide conveyance of his debtor's land, made after the Judgment, and at a time when the capacity to sue out an Elegit was suspended in consequence of no Execution having been sued out within the year, and no election entered on the Record, or for any other cause. These decisions proceeded upon the merits of the respective cases, and not upon the question of jurisdiction, and whether right or wrong, do not touch the case under consideration, either in respect to the question of jurisdiction, or upon its merits; for here all the Defendants were purchasers before the date of the Decrees, and are charged to have purchased fraudulently. And in all the cases upon the subject, in the English Court of Chancery, it seems to have been the uniform course to consider a Judgment, with a capacity to acquire the right to sue out an Elegit, by Scire Facias or otherwise, as such a lien as gave jurisdiction to the Court whenever other 630 circumstances justified its *interposition. And in no case has there ever been any enquiry whether the Judgment had been kept alive by taking out Execution within the year, or otherwise, or whether it had been actually revived or not, in the case of the death of either party, unless from some cause, (for instance the great lapse of time,) it was doubted whether the party could revive his capacity to sue out an Elegit, by reviving his Judgment, as in the case of Burroughs v. Elton, 11 Ves. 29.

However all this may be, I think it clear that at the time when this Bill was filed, the Plaintiffs had an existing capacity to sue out Elegits upon their Decrees, without any preliminary proceeding whatever. They had taken out Executions of Fieri Facias, which had been levied, and returned in part satisfied by the sale of the property taken, without any return of Nihil as to the residue. And in such a case, it is contended, that the Plaintiff could not take out an Elegit, without first taking out a new Execution of Fi. Fa., and having it returned Nihil, upon the ground that upon the just construction of our Statute concerning Executions, it was required that a party electing to resort to one species of Execution, could not resort to one of another description, until he had exhausted the effect of the first, by pursuing it to a return of Nihil or Non est Inventus; and, especially, that upon the literal terms of the Statute, an Elegit could not be taken out after a Fi. Fa. or Ca. Sa. returned, unless the return was Nihil, or Non est Inventus.

This leads us to a particular examination of our Statute, the first section of which provides, that all "persons who have, or shall hereafter recover any debt, damages or costs, in any Court of Record, may at their election prosecute Writs of Fieri Facias, Elegit, and Capias ad Satisfaciendum, within the year, for taking the goods, lands and body of the debtor." It then prescribes the teste and return days, and the forms of those Executions, and of their returns. The third section provides, 631 that "when any *Writ of Execution shall issue, and the party, at whose suit the same is issued, shall afterwards desire to take out another Writ of Execution at his own proper costs and charges, the Clerk may issue the same, if the first be not returned and executed; and where, upon a Ca. Sa. the Sheriff shall return, that the Defendant is not found, the Clerk may issue a Fi. Fa.; and if, upon a Fi. Fa. he shall return that the party hath no goods, or that only part of the debt is levied, in such case it shall be lawful to issue a Ca. Sa. upon the same Judgment; and where part of a debt shall be levied upon an Elegit, a new Elegit shall issue for the residue; and, where Nihil shall be returned upon any Writ of Elegit, a Ca. Sa. or Fi. Fa. may issue, and so vice versa; and where one Judgment is obtained against several Defendants, Execution thereon shall issue, as if it were against one Defendant, and not otherwise."

The fourth section, enacts the provisions of 32 Hen. 8, ch. 5, which provides, that if a tenant by Elegit be evicted, he may have Scire Facias against the debtor, his heirs, executors and administrators, and have such Executions for the residue of his debt unpaid, as if no Execution had theretofore issued, enlarging the provisions of the English Statute, in this, that whilst that only allowed a new Elegit, ours allows a new execution of any sort. The next three sections enact the provisions of the 16th and 17th Car. 2, ch. 5, declaring, that an Extent shall not be avoided on account of the omission of any lands which were extendable. The eighth and ninth sections enact the provisions of the 21st Jas. 1, ch. 24, authorising a new Execution against the lands and tenements, goods and chattels of a debtor dying in execution, except such lands and tenements as have been bona fide sold for the payment of some other creditor, and the proceeds so applied.

The thirteenth section enacts the provisions of 29th Car. 2, ch. 3, declaring, that goods shall be bound by a Fi. Fa. only from the time of the delivery to the Sheriff.

632 *The twenty-eighth section provides, that a debtor in execution may relieve his body, by surrendering goods to be sold as if taken under a Fi. Fa., provided that if they be not sufficient to pay the debt, or are subject to a lien, a new Fi. Fa. or Ca. Sa. may issue. These are all the provisions which touch the question under consideration.

The argument, that a party having once made an election to take one species of Execution, cannot afterwards resort to another, till that elected is exhausted by a return of Nihil or not found, proceeds upon the idea, that such is the effect of the first section giving such election, or the consequence of the particular provisions of the third section, according to which, in every case, (except one, in which a new species of Execution is allowed to be resorted to,) the former is supposed to be first returned Nihil, or not found; and so in the twenty-eighth section, in which a Fi. Fa. or a Ca. Sa. but not an Elegit, is allowed after a debtor has been discharged upon the surrender of property, which proves insufficient to pay the debt incumbered. And the other suggestion, that the literal terms of the Statute allowing a Ca. Sa. or Fi. Fa. after an Elegit returned Nihil, and so vice versa forbids an Elegit after a Ca. Sa. or Fi. Fa., unless they be returned Nihil in the one case, and not found in the other, proceeds upon the idea, that our Statutes have abrogated the Common Law in respect to Executions, and contain in their own provisions all the Laws in force upon that subject, none of which propositions appear to me to be sustainable. And if not, then upon Common Law principles connected with the Stautes giving the Elegit the latter Execution might issue after a Fi. Fa. in part satisfied, although not returned Nihil, as was decided in the case of Berry v. Wheeler, 14 Car. 2; 1st Siderfin, 91.

The Statute of Westm. 2, 13 Edw. 1, ch. 18, which gave the Elegit, is nearly in the language of ours: "Wnen debt is recovered or acknowledged in the King's Court, or damages awarded, it shall be from henceforth in the election *of him that sueth for such debt or damages, to have a Writ to the Sheriff Fiera Facias of the lards, (Levari Facias) 2 Inst. 395, and goods (Fi. Fa.) 2 Inst. Ibid., or that the Sheriff shall deliver to him all the chattels of the debtor, saving only his oxen and beasts of the plough, and the one-half of his land," &c. At this time, the Writ of Ca. Sa. in the case of a private person, was only allowed in cases of trespass vi et armis, when the Capias in Process laid. It was afterwards extended to other cases, by allowing the Capias ad Respondendum to them.

The early constructions of the Statute of Westminster, proceeding on the maxim that "electio unius est exclusio alterius," determined, that when the creditor had elected one species of Execution, he could never resort to any other, although that elected proved ineffectual. Thus, in 20 Edw. 2, Execution, 132, it was held, that after a Ca. Sa. awarded, although it was returned "not found," no other Execution could afterwards issue; and so in 19th H. 6th, it was held, that after an Elegit prayed and entered on the Record, the party could not resort to any other Writ of Execution, because he had made his election; and in the early cases there are many instances of the like construction. But this rigorous, and to creditors, michievous construction, gradually gave way to a more liberal spirit in the Courts of Justice, favoring the remedies of creditors, and in some instances, in which the contrary principle had become so fixed as to be beyond the power of the Courts, the Legislature interposed in their favor, as in the instances of the Statutes of Hen. 8, Jac. 1, and Ch. 2, incorporated into ours. And when our Statute of 1726, the prototype of the present, so far as the question under consideration is concerned, was passed, this principle of construction was almost wholly, and soon after was entirely repudiated, and the doctrine fully settled, that a creditor might take in succession all sorts of Execution, as long as it appeared that his Judgment was not, and until it was fully satisfied, unless indeed some Execution had been levied, which had *such a tendency to satisfy, as that there was no criterion by which to ascertain for what sum a new Execution should issue; as a Ca. Sa. executed, or lands extended under an Elegit. Our Statute of 1726, so far from intending to abolish the Common Law and English Statutes in force here in respect to Executions, and to return to the strict doctrine of election, which had prevailed in ancient times, was, I think, designed to declare, that the Common Law and English Statutes, prior to the 4th of James 1, were still in force here, and to be continued, and to adopt, not only the liberal constructions of the Courts in favor of creditors, as far as they had then gone, but the Statutes in the same spirit which had been passed since our Colonization. Accordingly, it recites that by the Common Law of England, and divers Acts of Parliament, which are binding on the people of this Colony, all creditors might, at their election, within the year, prosecute Executions of Fi. Fa., Ca. Sa. and Elegit; and professes only to prescribe the forms of those Executions, and their returns, in order to produce uniformity in practice. And whilst it omits to enact the Statute of Westm. 2, which gave the Elegit, and that of 32 Hen. 8, giving remedy to tenants by Elegit evicted, as being already in force, it enacts verbatim the other English Statutes, now incorporated in our Statute, which passed subsequent to the 4th James 1, which had no force here till so re-enacted. And the preamble to the section which enacted those provisions, which are now in the third section of our present Act, declared that they were enacted for the purpose of "removing all scruples which may be entertained amongst Clerks concerning the issuing of Executions;" and in giving directions concerning the issuing of Executions, the Act conformed to the most liberal decisions which had then taken place in favor of creditors. Thus, the first provision that the Plaintiff might have two Executions of different kinds in the hands of the Sheriff, provided he had only one executed, was contrary to the ancient principle of election, but in conformity to the then 635 *very recent decision (in 1725) of Stamper v. Hodson, 8 Mod. 302. So, as to the second provision, allowing a Fi. Fa. after a Ca. Sa. returned "Not found," which was in conformity to the decision in Hob. 57. So as to the third, allowing a Ca. Sa. after a Fi. Fa. returned "Nihil," or in part satisfied, which was according to Carr v. Copping, 4 James, cited 11 Vin. Abr. 38, pl. 5. So in the fourth case, of an Elegit allowed after an Elegit in part satisfied; that agreed with the decision in the case of Glasscock v. Morgan, 14 and 15 Car.; 1 Lev. 92. And so also in the fifth case, of a Ca. Sa. or Fi. Fa. after an Elegit returned "Nihil;" that was in conformity with the determination in Andrews v. Cope, 15 James 1; cited Hob. 57; 11 Vin. Abr. 42, Execution, (Y. a.) and so in the sixth case, of an Elegit after a Ca. Sa. returned "Not found," or a Fi. Fa. returned "Nihil;" that agreed with the more ancient cases of 30 Edw. 3, 24 and others. And the last provision, directing Executions to issue against several, as if there were but one Defendant, pursued the decision in Rosser v. Welch & Kemmis, Godb. 208; 11 Jas. 1; 11 Vin. Abr. Execution, (X. a.) pl. 19.

Considering, then, the general spirit and objects of this Statute, I cannot conceive that it was the intention of its framers to deprive creditors of remedies by Execution, which they would have had if the Statute had not been made. And even if these Statutes were considered as containing the whole Law of Executions, I should say that a right to take an Elegit after a Fi. Fa. in part satisfied, and not returned "Nihil" as to the residue, would fall within the spirit, and be sanctioned by the equity of the Statutes.

All the Defendants claiming lands directly under William Bentley, are volunteers, and the Deeds under which they claim, grossly fraudulent, and the Decree as to them correct.

The case is different as to the lands claimed by William A. Bentley and Coleman, indirectly under him, in respect 636 *to which the facts are these: In 1796 or 1797, William Bentley purchased of Wm. A. Cocke, upwards of eleven hundred acres of land, with an agreement that no Deed was to be made until he had given Bond and security for the purchase money. Wm. A. Bentley was then, and probably long after, an infant.

In August, 1805, Wm. A. Cocke, at the instance of Wm. Bentley, conveyed this land to Wm. A. Bentley, who paid no valuable consideration for it to any one. Wm. Bentley had not then paid the whole purchase money, or secured it to Cocke, but afterwards paid it to him.

In 1800, James Cocke and Wm. Bentley exchanged lands, Cocke giving him one hundred and fifty-four acres adjoining the land sold by Wm. A. Cocke to Bentley, at the price of 1,000l., and Bentley giving Cocke about eight hundred acres in Amelia, at $7 50 per acre. A considerable part of the difference was paid by James Cocke to William A. Bentley, by order of his father, William Bentley. In December, 1806, James Cocke, at the instance of Wm. Bentley, conveyed the one hundred and fifty-four acres of land to Wm. A. Bentley, who paid no valuable consideration to any one for it.

In May, 1807, Wm. A. Bentley conveyed to his brother Peter E. Bentley, six hundred acres of these two tracts of land, by a Deed reciting that their father had purchased the lands from the Messrs. Cockes, who had conveyed them to him at the instance, and by the permission of Wm. Bentley, who particularly enjoined it upon him to convey the six hundred acres to Peter E. Bentley, and this is the only consideration stated, and no other was given by Peter E. Bentley to any one.

In July, 1813, Peter E. Bentley conveyed five hundred and twenty acres of this land to Coleman, for the consideration of something more than $6,000, and in October, 1815, Wm. Bentley and his wife, with a view to bar her claim to dower, conveyed the same land to Coleman

637 *by a Deed reciting that William Bentley, had purchased the land of Cocke, but had not procured any conveyance to himself, or in trust, and had given it to Peter E. Bentley and Wm. A. Bentley, his sons, to the last of whom Cocke had conveyed the land at his request, who especially enjoined it on William A. Bentley to convey to Peter E. Bentley, all that part of the land which laid above the bridge road. At this time, Coleman had paid only about three-fourths of the purchase money to Peter E. Bentley, but afterwards paid the balance, before, as he says in his Answer, he had any notice of the fraud charged upon the Bentleys, by the Plaintiffs.

At the several periods when all these transactions took place, William Bentley was largely indebted as their Guardian to the female Appellees, who, in August, 1806 chose new Guardians, and in November, 1807, instituted the suit against William Bentley for the settlement of his accounts as their Guardian, in which they obtained the Decrees (in 1819,) which are the foundation of this suit.

In 1807, and early in 1808, Bentley conveyed the residue of his estate, real and personal, without any valuable consideration to his other children, and in September, 1811, took the oath of an insolvent debtor. None of the Deeds, under which Coleman claims, from those of the Cockes to William A. Bentley, inclusive, were duly recorded. This fact was not charged in the Bill, but being urged at the hearing, time was given to enquire into it, and the fact afterwards admitted to be so.

If the legal title to these lands had even been in William Bentley, and were claimed under him by direct conveyances from him, made under the circumstances accompanying the transfer of his equitable title to William A. Bentley, his Deeds would clearly be void for fraud, so far as William A. Bentley was concerned, and even in respect to Coleman, if he had notice of the fraud.

Some doubt seems at one time to have existed upon the question, whether, if a father or husband purchase lands

638 *in the name of his child or wife, or in his own name, causing in either case a conveyance to be made to the wife or child, the transaction could be impeached by a creditor of, or purchaser from, the husband or father, upon the ground of fraud, inasmuch as in such case there is no resulting trust for the husband or father, as in the case of a purchase by one, and a conveyance to a stranger.

In Lady George's Case, cited Cro. Car. 550, as decided in the 10th of Car. a father having purchased in the name of his daughter, and afterwards sold to another, it was held in the King's Bench, that unless there were some fraud discovered, it was not within the 27th Eliz. though there be many badges of fraud.

In Back v. Andrews, Prec. Ch. 1; 2 Vern. 120, (1689,) a father purchased copyhold, which was conveyed to himself, and his wife and daughter, and their heirs. This was held to be an advancement for the wife and daughter, and not a trust for the husband, and that a mortgage by him should not bind the lands in the lifetime of the wife and daughter.

In Fletcher v. Sedley, 2 Vern. 490, (1704,) Wright, Lord Keeper, inclined, that a lease purchased by A., and conveyed to B. in trust for A. during his life, and afterwards for C., who lived with A. as his wife, and was so reputed, was not assets of A., nor liable after his death to his creditors; for when a man purchases, he may settle as he pleases, and thought that fraudulent conveyances are made so only by the several Statutes made for that purpose.

In Proctor v. Warren, Sel. Ca. in Lord

King's time, 78, (1739,) Lord King said, that he did not know that it had ever been determined, that if a man indebted, intending to provide for his children, has an estate originally conveyed to them, it should be subject to his debts.

On these cases, which are all that I have met with tending to establish the proposition, that such a transaction cannot be impeached for fraud, I remark, that in Lady George's Case, and that of Back v. 639 Andrews, no fraud appears *to have been established, and the declarations of Keeper Wright and Lord King in the other cases, were mere dicta, upon which no Judgment was founded.

The case of Stileman v. Ashdown, as it can be collected from the Reports of Atkyns, vol. 2, p. 477, and Ambler, pl. 13, appears to have been thus: The father purchased lands, which were conveyed, in 1700, jointly to himself and one of his sons, and their heirs, and other land, which, in 1708, was conveyed jointly to himself and another of his sons. The dates of these purchases are not noticed. They were probably contemporaneous with the conveyances. The father was also entitled to an equity of redemption of an estate mortgaged to one of his said sons. In 1721, a creditor of the father obtained a Judgment against him. The father continued in possession of these lands until his death in 1735, when his sons entered upon the estates respectively conveyed to them jointly with their father. The Executor of the creditor filed his Bill against the sons, for satisfaction out of the mortgaged and purchased estates. In 1742, Lord Hardwicke decreed, that the Plaintiff might redeem the mortgage; in which case the mortgaged premises should be sold, and the money paid for the redemption of the mortgage, refunded, and then the Judgment, and the costs at law and in Equity, satisfied. And if the sales of the mortgaged premises should not be sufficient to satisfy the whole of the Plaintiff's demands, that then a moiety of each of the estates, conveyed jointly to the father and his son respectively, should be sold, and the balance due to the Plaintiffs paid out of the proceeds rateably and proportionably, and the surplus paid to the sons respectively. But, if the sales of the whole property should not be sufficient to pay the whole of the plaintiff's demands, the Court reserved the consideration of the rents and profits of the two moieties directed to be sold. Upon a re-hearing in 1743, upon the petition of the Plaintiff, who considered himself aggrieved in that, the Decree did *not subject the whole of the purchased lands, and all their rents and profits to his demands, the Decree was affirmed.

In this case the whole of the purchased lands conveyed jointly to the father and sons, was considered, so far as the creditor was concerned, as belonging to the father, but as between the father and the sons respectively, and as between the sons, as belonging to the latter, according to the conveyances. A moiety was condemned to satisfy the Plaintiff's demand, not because the father was entitled by the conveyances to a moiety, for in that case the right of survivorship in the sons, which they insisted on, would have been preferable to the lien of the Judgment on the father's moiety; (6 Co. Rep. 79, Lord Abergavenny's Case;) but because considering the father as entitled to the whole, so far as the creditor was concerned, yet only a moiety could be subjected in Equity, since no more could have been reached at Law, if it had been a legal estate.

Lord Hardwicke, as reported by Atkyns, argued that although a purchase by a father, in the name of a child, in general imported an intention to advance the child, and prevented the implication of a trust for the father, such as would arise in the case of a conveyance to a stranger, yet that a conveyance jointly to the father and child, was not calculated to effect the object of an advancement, and left it doubtful whether it was so intended; a suggestion which contradicted the express decisions in point in Scroope v. Scroope, 1 Ch. Ca. 27; 15 Car. 2, and Back v. Andrews, before noticed, and the subsequent decision in Dyer v. Dyer, noticed in 1 P. Wms. 112, Note; and I am persuaded that Lord Hardwicke's Judgment did not proceed on that ground, for if, as between the father and children, respectively, there was a trust for the father, and therefore, and for that reason only, the property liable for his debts, then for the same reason, the surplus of the sales, after satisfying the debt, would have been Decreed to be paid to the eldest son, as heir at law, 641 and who was a party, *whereas the Decree was precisely such as must be made in the case of all fraudulent conveyances, setting them aside so far as to let in the claims of creditors, and leaving them to have full effect as between the parties. And that this was the ground of the Judgment, appears by Lord Hardwicke's concluding observation: "It is not necessary that a man should be actually indebted at the time he enters into a voluntary settlement, to make it fraudulent, for if he does it with a view to his being indebted at a future time, it is equally so, and ought to be set aside." And Sugden, in his Treatise on the Law of Vendors, (page 424,) justly considers this as the ground of the Judgment, "the settlement being considered as voluntary, and fraudulent against creditors." And after showing that the case of a joint conveyance to father and child cannot be distinguished from that of a conveyance to the child only, but that in both cases, as between the parties, it should be considered as an advancement, he adds, "Fraud is of course an exception to every rule."

Thus we have against the dicta of Keeper Wright and Lord King, the express decision of Lord Hardwicke, in Stileman v. Ashdown, and the implied admission in Lady George's Case, that a purchase by a father, and a conveyance to a child, may be impeached for fraud, either by a creditor of, or purchaser from, the father. And so in Christ's Hospital v. Budgin et ux. 2 Vern. 683, it was said, that a purchase in the name of a wife or child after marriage, and voluntary, may, perhaps, be fraudulent as against creditors, in like manner as if the settlement was of property actually vested in the husband or father. And deplorable, indeed, would be the imbecility of the Law if it could not reach such a case as that under consideration. Here the father purchased in his own name, and not in the names of his children: he held the property, in one instance, as his own ten years, and in the other six, not only apparently, but as the real beneficial owner of the property. He was then largely indebted, and any creditor who could 642 then "have had a Judgment against him, might have subjected that property to the payment of his debts, either under our Statute, making uses and trusts liable to the charges and debts of the cestui qui trust, or upon the original principles of a Court of Equity, which, following the Law, will, in general, give such relief against equitable estates of the debtor, as might be had at Law, if the estate was legal. The beneficial estate was settled in the father, and it was as much a fraud to give away to a child this beneficial interest, to the prejudice of his creditors, as to have conveyed away the legal title in like manner, if he had it. If such a transaction could not be held to fall within the Statute of Frauds, I should think it might be well reached by the general principles of Equity, according to which the Cockes were trustees for William Bentley. And although a conveyance by them to his son, with William Bentley's assent, would, as between the parties, extinguish the trust, and the son would hold the land exempt from it, yet a Court of Equity might well hold, that by reason of the fraudulent intent of this transfer, the existing trust for William Bentley should not be thereby destroyed, but should still subsist so far as creditors were concerned; upon the ground that persons acquiring a title by fraud are held to be trustees for the injured person, although they certainly did not intend to require the property in that character.

The Decree was, therefore, right also as respects the lands held by William A. Bentley, and has properly directed the whole, and not a moiety only of the lands held subject to satisfy the demand of the Appellees, to be sold, since there were several Decrees on the same day; each of which would have taken a moiety of the lands, if they had been extendable at Law.

As to Coleman, I think he must be considered as a bona fide purchaser, for valuable consideration, without notice of the fraud, and therefore protected against the operation of the Statute of Frauds by its proviso. And as to the lands held by him, 643 the only question is, whether they are liable "to the claims of Bentley's creditors on account of the Deeds under which he claims not being duly recorded. Upon the fullest consideration, I am of opinion that they are not. So far as Coleman is concerned, we are to consider the case as if William A. Bentley had given to his father an adequate valuable consideration for the transfer of his interest in the lands purchased from the Cockes, and that the transaction was tainted by no fraud. The equitable interest of the father was not transferred to the son by the execution of Deeds to him by the Cockes, but by the previous authority given by him to them to execute those Deeds. And if such an authority had been given by the letter, and the Deeds never made, a bona fide purchaser of the equitable interest from William A. Bentley, would have had a better right now to call upon the Cockes for their conveyance of the legal title, than any creditor of William Bentley getting a Judgment against him after the transfer of his equitable right to his son. Such a transfer was valid without Deed, and was not necessarily to be recorded to make it available against his creditors. The Deeds from the Cockes passed, not Bentley's equitable title, but their naked legal title only, and if void so far as to leave that title still in them, yet those Deeds, together with the other evidence in the cause, would be full proof that William Bentley's equitable right was transferred to his son, and in respect to Coleman, we must take it to have been done (as before said) bona fide, and for valuable consideration: So, that if we held the Deeds to be void, it would not avail the Appellees any thing. The Decree as to Coleman should therefore be reversed, and the Bill dismissed, and in all other respects affirmed.

The PRESIDENT, and JUDGES CABELL, COALTER, and CARR concurred.

644 *Cole's Administrator v. M'Rae.

December, 1828.

Chancery Practice—Decree to Sell Land—Priority of Liens.—If there be several parties who claim to be paid their debts, and to be indemnified for security out of a debtor's land and chattels conveyed by Deeds, and there be an adversary creditor by Judgment, who claims to have the Deeds set aside for fraud, and the property sold to pay his Judgment-debt, an interlocutory Decree, which, without deciding on the validity of the Deeds, or the extent to which, and in what order the said several debts are chargeable on the property, yet directs that the lands conveyed shall be sold for cash, and the proceeds to be paid into Bank to the credit of the cause, is premature and erroneous, because it has a tendency to sacrifice the property, by discouraging the creditors from bidding, as they probably would, if their right to satisfaction of their debts, &c. had been previously ascertained.

Chancery Practice—Decree to Sell Land—Priority of Liens.—It is a well-settled rule that where there are conflicting claims to priority out of the proceeds of land about to be sold to satisfy the liens upon it, the court in order to prevent the danger of sacrificing the property by discouraging the creditors from bidding as they probably might if their right to satisfaction of their debts and the order in which they were to be paid out of the property, were previously ascertained, should declare the order of payment before it decrees the sale to be made. Jaeger v. Boissieux, 15 Gratt. 108, citing the principal case, and Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Gratt. 164, as its authority. And in Bristol Iron, etc., Co. v. Caldwell, 9 Va. 48, 27 S. E. Rep. 838, it is said: "There is no better settled rule of equity practice in this state than that which declares it to be premature and erroneous to decree a sale of land to satisfy encumbrances thereon before ascertaining the liens binding the land, and their amounts and priorities. This principle was established at an early day in the leading case of Cole v. M'Rae, 6 Rand. 644, where it was held that such a decree was premature and erroneous, because a sale, without previously ascertaining and determining the liens and incumbrances, and the order in which they are chargeable, has a tendency to sacrifice the property sold, by discouraging the creditors from bidding, as they probably would, if their right to the satisfaction of their debts, etc., had been previously ascertained. This case has been followed by numerous decisions sale of chattels, because they are perishable, liable to be wasted, and no sacrifice need be apprehended, because they may be sold in detail.

Same.—Conflicting Claims to Land.—Disposal of Land Until Rights Ascertained.—As to the lands, they should in such case, be put into the hands of a receiver, to be rented out, until the rights of the parties, in respect to that subject, are determined, leaving a due regard to the rights of the widow of the debtor.

John M' Rae of Petersburg, filed his Bill on the 4th February, 1822, in the Richmond Chancery, against William Cole and others, which states, that he obtained a Judgment in the Superior Court of Law of Petersburg, in October, 1820, for $9,120, with interest from 30th June, 1820, till paid and costs, subject to a credit of $4,153, from the 23d October, 1820: that a Ca. Sa. was issued, Cole was arrested, and took the insolvent oath on the 30th December, of the same year, giving in a schedule of his estate, consisting only of three bonds, executed to him by one Thomas P. Cocke, for $166 67 each. He charges that Cole, aware that Judgment would be rendered against him, prepared to render it unavailing, by a succession of fraudulent conveyances, and that he still lives on a farm in genteel style, enjoying many luxuries as well as comforts. The first of those conveyances was made in July, 1820, to Benjamin Harrison as Trustee, (whom he makes a Defendant,) to whom he conveyed personal property, consisting of twenty slaves, his stock of horses, mules, cattle, and hogs, his plantation utensils, household furniture, of which much was of an expensive character, and kitchen

645 furniture, for the purpose *of securing the payment of six or seven thousand dollars, for which the uncles of his wife, Benjamin Cocke, and Thomas Cocke, were his sureties, or creditors: that of these debts $3,385 were due for a tract of land then recently purchased by Cole from Byrnes's Executors, which land was under no incumbrance, and would have constituted a more certain indemnity than personal estate, if fraud against creditors had not been intended: that $1,354 were due to Benjamin Cocke by Bond of that date, and that the balance was due on delivery Bonds, against any danger from which no indemnity ought to have been required, unless the debtor was suspected of the vilest fraud. The second Deed was executed on the 13th October, 1820, by Cole and Wife, by which they conveyed to Benjamin Cocke, as Trustee, three tracts of land containing nine hundred acres, more or less, near Petersburg, on the extraordinary trust, the Trustee should at the end of one year, sell the land on a credit of one, two, three, and four years, and out of the proceeds of such sale, should pay those of Cole's creditors who should, within thirty days, sign the Deed, and thus become parties thereto: but, he avers that no one creditor did sign it, and therefore it became of no effect. The third Deed was executed by the said William Cole on the 29th December, 1820, by which he conveyed to Thomas P. Cocke, his wife's brother, absolutely, all his interest in the lands and slaves before-mentioned, and all his wife's interest in the dower slaves held by her mother, for the paltry consideration of $500, which were paid in the three Bonds mentioned in the schedule aforesaid. He charges that this Deed was executed by Cole, with full knowledge that the Execution was in the hands of the Sheriff, and after he had promised to surrender himself on the 30th, and for the sole purpose of enabling him to take the insolvent oath. He offers to allow $5,000 instead of $500, for the lands and slaves so conveyed, and will consent that the Court shall Decree an immediate sale of them for cash: that 646 all debts then legally *chargeable on them under the Deeds aforesaid, shall first be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, and that the $5,000 shall be allowed as a credit to Cole in part of the Plaintiff's Judgment. He calls on Cole to say, whether he will accept the offer: if not, he calls on Cole, and Thomas and Benjamin Cocke, who are made Defendants, to say whether they did not design by the first Deed to protect the property against his debt, and especially whether the personal property was included with any other view, and whether the said Thomas and Benjamin entertained any apprehension of loss, when they professed to take a Deed of indemnity: he requires also Cole, and Benjamin Cocke, to state what debts were intended to be secured by the second Deed, and whether it was not intended to drive the Plaintiff into a compromise, or sale of his claim, upon terms which he had rejected: and he requires Thomas P. Cocke, who is also made a Defendant, to say what was the inducement to the execution of the last Deed, whether he did not promise to cancel it; whether he did really intend to force his brother-in-law to abide by so ruinous a sale, and whether it was not designed to defeat the Plaintiff's demand. He prays, that the Sheriff of Prince George County, in whom the property vests by operation of the Statute, and whom he makes a Defendant, may be decreed to sell the property, or that it may be sold in some other way, and that his Judgment debt may be paid.

The Deeds are filed as exhibits, and they are truly set out, except that the last Deed conveys to Thomas P. Cocke, all of Cole's interest in the lands and negroes conveyed by the two Deeds of Trust, "after the payment of the said debts," &c.

The Defendant Cole, in his Answer, admits the Judgment against him, but denies that it is a just debt; says, it was founded on an award, which he is endeavouring by a Bill in Equity against M'rae, to set aside. He denies, that there is any fraud in the conveyances, or any intention of fraud, either on his part, or on the part of the other *parties to those Deeds; he denies that he is living in comfort and luxury. He says, that the whole amount of the property conveyed by the Deeds, will not sell for more than $500, if so much, over and above the debts they were intended to secure. He denies, that the land he purchased of Byrnes's Executors is unincumbered; on the contrary, he avers that it is under an incumbrance to a former owner of it, although the Defendant did not know it when he purchased, but that being so incumbered, Thomas Cocke, his surety, thought it prudent to take a Deed on slaves, and other personal property, as an indemnity. He admits the execution of the conveyances to Thomas P. Cocke, for the consideration of $500; says, that he had only an equity of redemption in that property, and that the price agreed on is a full consideration for it. He denies, that there was any agreement between himself and the said Thomas P., to have the interest restored, or re-conveyed, or released to the Defendant. He says, that the second Deed expresses truly on its face the true intention of the parties. As to the offer of the Plaintiff to give $5,000, he considers it an artful attempt to seduce the Defendants into an admission that the Deed was fraudulent, and therefore repels the offer with indignation. He hopes to be able to set aside the Judgment of the Plaintiff, but if he should fail in that, he expresses his willingness that the property may all be sold in any manner the Court may direct.

Thomas Cocke, in his Answer, repels with indignation, the imputation of fraud against him. He says, when he consented to become Cole's surety for the purchase of Byrnes's land, he was not apprised of Cole's embarrassment: that he executed the Bond as surety, for Cole, to Byrnes's Executors, under a conviction that a mortgage of the land had been previously executed by Cole, as had been stipulated, and he knows not why the Executors failed to require a mortgage, and thereby undertook to augment the responsibility of the sureties: that, when the Defendant obtained a lien on personal property from Cole, *his inducement was, not only to secure himself against loss, in consequence of the depressed value of the land, but as a protection against other large sums for which he had been security for Cole. He says, that he has reason to believe, that the property conveyed by the said Deed will be inadequate to discharge the debts intended to be secured by it, and that the reason why the property has not been sold to pay that debt, is, because the last Bond has recently fallen due, and that further proceedings on the part of Byrnes's representatives have been enjoined by the Chancellor: that the Defendant is perfectly willing that a sale be made of all of Cole's property, being assured that the Chancellor will save the Defendant harmless, and direct the purchase money due to Byrnes's Executors, to be paid out of the lands, if the personal subject should be inadequate.

Benjamin Cocke in his Answer denies fraud, and says, that he had a just claim against Cole for the amount stated in the Deed to Harrison: that the Defendant proposed to the Complainant to compromise his controversy with Cole, because he believed that the Plaintiff, in the exchange of lands, had obtained a very great advantage over Cole: that the Plaintiff rejected the proposal, whereupon the Defendant advised Cole to execute a Deed for the benefit of all his creditors, so that all might come in for a distributable share. He declares his willingness that a Decree should be pronounced, directing a sale of the property.

Thomas P. Cocke in his Answer admits, that he became a purchaser of the residue of Cole's estate, for $500: that, at the time of the purchase, it was believed not to be worth more after the payment of all Cole's debts, and the Defendant is still of that opinion. He denies, that he contemplated any fraud in this transaction: that it was his wish to preserve for his sister and her children the remnant of the estate. He says, he does not know how it can be considered fraudulent, when he was not to be entitled to any part of the estate, till all the debts were paid. If *he had intended to have covered Cole's estate, and protected it from the payment of his debts, he might have been justly charged with fraud, but his interest was not to accrue till after the payment of the debts, and that the payment of Cole's debts was the inducement to the execution of the Deed. He expresses his willingness that a Decree should be made, to sell Cole's whole estate to pay all of his debts, and the Defendant is willing to surrender all his interest under the Deed, after being paid the money already advanced by him.

So much for the Bill and Answers in the suit of M'rae against Cole and others.

The Record also contains the proceedings in a cross suit in Chancery, brought by Cole against M'rae. In that suit, Cole represents that the debt on which M'rae had obtained a Judgment against him, arose out of a contract for an exchange of lands. He had purchased M'rae's lots in Petersburg, and land adjacent, of which the price was fixed, and had given in exchange several valuable tracts in Tennessee, of which the price was kept open. Pending the action at Law, brought by M'rae against him, on the contract, the parties referred their dispute to arbitrators, who decided that he should receive only $2 per acre for his Tennessee land, Cole claiming $4. The sum awarded, constituted the credit on M'rae's Judgment. The object of Cole's Bill was to set aside the award, and the Judgment consequent thereon. He objected to the award, not on account of the want of integrity or ability in the arbitrators, but because they were misled and deceived by the testimony of the only witness who was examined before them, and because great injustice had been done to him in ascertaining the value of the land, which he endeavoured to support by proof. At the hearing on the Bill, Answers and Depositions, Cole's Bill was dismissed by the Chancellor, and is supposed to have been finally disposed of. It is not necessary to say more here as to that case, because it is not referred to in the 650 Decree either of "the Chancellor, or of the Court of Appeals, in the suit which forms the subject of this Report.

During the progress of this suit, about March, 1824, Cole died, leaving a widow. The suit was revived in the name of Benjamin Cocke, jr., the Administrator, but the widow does not appear to have been made a party.

At the Term in March, 1827, the Chancellor entered and interlocutory Decree in this case, of M' Rae against Cole's Administrator and others, to the following effect:

"The Court, not deciding on the priority of any of the creditors before it, doth order, that one of its Commissioners do state an account of the several claims and debts which may be chargeable upon the estate in the proceedings mentioned: that the Defendants, Benjamin Harrison and Thomas Cocke, do render before the same Commissioner an account of the trust property disposed of by them: that the Commissioner make report, &c., and that unless the Defendants, or one of them, do within six months pay the Plaintiff the amount of his Judgment, (specifying it,) and the costs of this suit, the Marshal of this Court, or one of his Deputies, after giving six weeks previous notice of the time and place of sale, &c. &c., do sell to the highest bidder, for cash, on the premises, the tract of land in that County, (Prince George,) in the proceedings mentioned, whereof William Cole died possessed, and pay the proceeds of sale into the Bank of Virginia at Petersburg, to the credit of this cause, subject to the future order of the Court, and report his proceedings to the Court."

In February, 1828, the Court of Appeals granted a Supersedeas to so much of the above Decree as related to the sale of the land.

Allison, for the Appellants.

651 December 18. JUDGE GREEN prepared the following Decree, which was concurred in by JUDGES CABELL, COALTER and CARR, and entered as the Decree of the Court.

"The Decree in this case not having decided upon the validity of any of the Deeds mentioned in the proceedings, and impeached by the Plaintiff as fraudulent, nor as to the extent to which, and in what order, the debts due from the Defendant, Cole, to the Plaintiff, and the other Defendants, are chargeable upon the property professedly conveyed by those Deeds, it is not thought proper in this stage of the proceedings to decide those questions here. And although it is clear that the whole property conveyed by those Deeds, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay all the debts aforesaid, must be sold for that purpose in the progress of this cause, yet the Court doubting whether it was proper to direct the real property in question to be sold for cash to be deposited in the Bank to the credit of the cause before these questions were decided, since that course had a tendency to sacrifice the property, by discouraging the creditors from bidding, as they probably would, if their right to satisfaction of their debts, and the order in which they were to be paid out of the property, were previously ascertained, awarded a Supersedeas in respect to the land only, leaving the Decree as to the personal property to be executed, inasmuch as that was perishable, and liable to be wasted, and no such sacrifice was to be apprehended in respect thereto from the causes aforesaid, since it could be sold in detail. And the Court is now of opinion that the Decree, so far as it directed the lands, in the proceedings mentioned, to be sold, was premature, and therefore erroneous: and that the said lands should have been put into the hands of a receiver, to be by him rented out until the rights of the parties, in respect to that sub- 652 ject, *were determined, having a due regard to the rights also of the widow of Cole, if any she has."

The Decree was therefore reversed, so far as it conflicts with this opinion, and affirmed as to the residue, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded in accordingly.

Deed of Emancipation—Construction—Increase—Case at Bar.—A Deed of Emancipation, by which the master manumits his slaves at his death, directs, that they shall serve him as long as he lives, and at his death go free from all persons; and, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, relinquishes all his right and title to the said negroes, is to be construed as passing a present right to freedom, reserving a right in the grantor to their personal services during his life, as a condition of the emancipation. Therefore, a child born of one of the emancipated females in the interval between the execution of the Deed and the death of the grantor, is free from its birth.

This was an appeal from a Judgment of the Superior Court of Law for the County of Accomack. The Appellant Isaac, instituted an action in forma pauperis against John G. Joynes, Executor of Abel West, deceased to recover his freedom. The Jury who tried the cause, found a special verdict, as follows: That Abel West, in the year, 1806, was possessed of a negro woman named Jenny, as his slave; that on the 8th April, 1806, he manumitted the said Jenny by a Deed in these words, to wit: "Know all men by these presents that I Abel West of Accomack County and State of Virginia, for divers good causes and considerations, thereunto me moving, have and by these presents do manumit and set free the following negroes at *my death: they shall serve me as long as I shall live, and at my death shall go free from all persons, and I do hereby for myself, my heirs, executors and administrators, relinquish all my right and title in, and unto the aforesaid negroes, Josiah, Joshua, Nanny, Brittany, Fanny, Toby, Stephen, Alcy, Sampson, Nancy, Jenny, Jack, Mary, Perey, Peter, Frank, Levin, Strong, Kesiah, James, Annet, Candis, Adam, Mehala. In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 8th April, 1806, Abel West, (Seal.)" Which deed was duly recorded. They found, that on the 1st January, 1806, the said Abel West placed the said negro Jenny, and other negroes belonging to him, upon that part of the tract of land supposed to be two hundred acres, which in his Will he devised to the negroes which belonged to him, and the said Jenny continued to live on the said land, from that time until the death of Abel West, and from that time till Isaac, the Plaintiff, was taken possession of by the Defendant: that the Plaintiff is the son of Jenny, and was born in 1813, and lived with his mother from the day of his birth till the day of the death of the said Abel West: that the said Jenny and the other negroes cultivated the said two hundred acres of land, and used the profits; and the said West neither cultivated, nor interfered with the cultivation of the said land after Jenny and the other negroes were placed on it, nor had it been cultivated for many year before by any one: that all the negroes who were placed on the said tract were considered in the neighbourhood as free, and were dealt with, and dealt with others as such. from the time they were placed there till West's death: that Nanny, in the said Deed mentioned, who lived on the said tract, hired out her son Toby, from 1810, to 1813, inclusive and her son Sam, for 1813, and received the hires: that Jack, in the said Deed mentioned, is a child of Jenny, and that the said West, when he placed Jenny on the land, gave up to her the boy Jack, who continued in possession of his mother till he arrived to the age of twenty-one years, and *that for three years, beginning in 1811, he was hired out by her, and she received the hires: that the said West never made any objection to the dealings and transactions of the said Jenny and the other negroes, or exercised any control over them: that in 1803, the said Abel West declared that he intended after his death, that his slaves should never serve his relations, or any one else. They found, that Abel West died 30th May, 1816, having first made his last Will and Testament, bearing date 22d of that month, which Will is found in hæc verba. [After devising sundry tracts of land to his relations, and bequeathing them sundry valuable cattels, he says. "Item, I give all the negroes which belonged to me the land lying above the Neck road, supposed to be two hundred acres more or less, it being part of the land where I now live, to them and their heirs forever on the female side in common amongst them all as a place of refuge. I also authorise my Executors to give them thirty barrels of corn, and one thousand weight of pork. I also give them all the flax, wool, and leather that may be in the house at my death. Item, I give to my men Joshua, Will, Sam, Parker, Edmund, and Adam, forty dollars each should they finish the crop." He appoints the Defendant his Executor.]

The Jury also found, that the two hundred acres given by the Will to the negroes, is the same land on which Jenny and the other negroes had been placed by West, at the time aforesaid: that the said West, after the payment of his debts, left, besides negroes, personal estate of the value of more than $4,000: that Joshua, Brittany, Sampson, Mary, Perry, Frank, and Adam, named in the said Deed lived with West till his death, and that Brittany and Mary had several children born after April, 1806, all of whom also lived with West till his death, and that Alice was placed by West with John G. Joynes, after April, 1806, and continued with him till West's death. The Jury also found a Deed executed by West, bearing date 27th June, 1808, by which, after reciting that he had *by the Deed of April, 1806, manumitted Josiah after his death, he released to the said Josiah his life estate in him, and all claim to his services, from that time, making him as completely free in every respect as he had a right to do, which Deed was duly recorded. They also found that the said Abel West had, by Deed of the 24th February, 1806, which was duly recorded, emancipated sundry other slaves, eleven in number, absolutely, and without any reservation of right to their services. It was also agreed that Adam and Joshua, mentioned in the Will, were the same negroes named in the Deed of April, 1806.

Upon this statement of facts, the question was referred to the Court, to decide whether the Plaintiff Isaac was entitled to his freedom or not. The Superior Court adjudged the Law to be for the Defendant, from which the Plaintiff appealed.

Johnson and Stanard, for the Defendant.
December 18. JUDGE GREEN.

In April, 1806, Abel West emancipated many of his slaves, by a Deed, which in the same month was duly recorded, upon his acknowledgment. Amongst these was Jenny, the mother of the Appellant, who was born in 1813. West died in 1816. The operative words of the Deed were: "I, Abel West have, and by these presents do manumit, and set free the following negroes at my death; they shall serve me as long as I live, and at my death shall go free from all persons; and I do hereby for myself, and my heirs, executors, and administrators relinquish all my right, and title of, in, and unto the aforesaid negroes Josiah," &c.

In the month of January preceding the date of the Deed, many of the negroes were settled by West, upon two hundred acres of land, which he afterwards devised to the negroes, which had belonged to him. These were from the time of that settlement, practically free, rendering no service to West, and appropriating all their earnings to their own use, some of the women hiring out their children, and receiving their hires. Some of the slaves named in the Deed, continued to serve West until his death.

If the civil condition of Jenny was changed from that of slavery to freedom, immediately on the execution of the Deed, Isaac was born free, although she might have been bound to service during her former master's life. On the contrary, if she continued a slave till West's death, he was born a slave, and so continues, notwithstanding the subsequent change of his mother's condition.

If the first clause of the Deed conferring freedom on these slaves, was the only one having that effect, it is clear that they would have continued slaves to all intents and purposes, until West's death. On the other hand, if the last clause was the only one in the Deed which had that effect, they would have been immediately free. And if there were no other clause affecting the construction of the Deed, I should think the generality of the last would be modified by the first so as to give effect to the manifest purpose of holding the slaves during West's life-time, and in the absence of any evidence of his intention as to the mode of holding them, it must have been taken that he intended to continue to hold them as he then did, as absolute slaves, to be disposed of during his life, as he pleased, by transferring them for that time to any other purpose, or otherwise. The second clause, which declares that they should serve him during his life, seems to indicate that he did not intend to reserve his original and general power over them, as a master entitled to dispose of them during his life, at his pleasure, by selling them to others, but only to impose on them the obligation to serve him personally as he should require.

657 *The three clauses, then, taken together, may be considered, as modifying each other, so that all may have some effect, and be construed to give immediate freedom, to all intents and purposes except to hold them bound to serve West himself, personally, during his life. They may be read together thus: "I Abel West have, and by these presents do manumit, and set free, and do hereby for myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators, relinquish all my right and title of, in and unto the following negroes Josiah, &c. But they shall serve me as long as I shall live, and at my death shall go free from all persons." The effect of this would be that he renounced all his right and title as master, from that moment, reserving a right to claim their personal services to himself only, as a condition of the emancipation. If this condition was against Law, as inconsistent with the right granted, it would not frustrate the grant. Thus, a condition that the grantee should not enjoy the estate granted, but in a particular way, or should not alienate it, would be void, and not affect the validity of the grant; and so in case of a grant of present freedom to a female slave, with a condition that her future issue should be slaves, the condition is against Law, and void, but does not invalidate the grant, as was held in Fulton v. Shaw, 4 Rand. 597.

If this construction is doubtful, some weight is due to the maxim, that every Deed is to be taken most strongly against the grantor, and to the spirit of the Laws of all civilized nations which favours liberty. "In obscura voluntate manumissionis, favendum est libertati." Dig. Lib. 50, tit. 17, § 179, Ulpian. And for the Common Law, see Coke Litt. 124, b.

The Judgment of the Superior Court ought to be reversed, and Judgment entered for the Plaintiff.

Equity Jurisdiction—Settlement of Accounts.—Where a Plaintiff goes into Equity for a settlement of accounts, on the ground that he cannot substantiate the items in his account, except by the Answer, and testimony of the Defendant himself, and in the progress of the suit it appears by his own showing, that the account is susceptible of proof by witnesses, in a Court of Law, his Bill ought to be dismissed.

Same—Damages for Breach of Contract.—A bill in Equity does not lie to recover damages for a breach of contract merely sounding in damages.

This was an appeal from a Decree rendered by the Superior Court of Chancery held at Greenbrier Court-house, in favor of the Appellee, against the Appellant, for the sum of $325, with interest from the day of rendering the Decree, until paid, subject to a credit for the sum of $118 23 cents. It is not deemed necessary to give any other statement of the case than that which is contained in the opinion of the Judge who delivered the opinion of the Court.

December 18. JUDGE GREEN.

The Appellee, John Mayse, filed his Bill against the Appellant, Joseph Meze, stating, that he had been appointed a Deputy for the Appellant, a High Sheriff of Greenbrier County, and had agreed to pay $150 for the deputation. He charges, that the Appellant had discharged him from his office of Deputy before his office expired, contrary to his contract, and without just cause. He states, that during his continuance in the office of Deputy Sheriff, he had collected some arrearages of taxes accruing before he was Deputy, and intending to pay them over to the High Sheriff, he had, by mistake, paid him a part of the taxes which he had collected for the 659 year in which he was Deputy, to *the amount of $36 02, which he afterwards paid into the Treasury: that the High Sheriff had collected other taxes due in the year in which the Plaintiff was Deputy to the amount of $82 40, for which he, the Equitable Jurisdiction.—See monographic note on "Jurisdiction" appended to Philpen v. Durham, 8 Gratt. 457.

A bill even without a demurrer will be dismissed at the hearing, if it shows no ground for equitable relief. Surber v. McClintic, 10 W. Va. 247, citing the principal case.

Plaintiff, had also accounted to the Treasury; and prays for a Decree on this score for $74 02, the balance of the two sums above mentioned, after deducting $44 40, a proportion of the price which he was to pay for the deputation of the office, according to the time during which he was permitted to continue in the office. He also prays for a Decree for damages for the violation of the contract by the High Sheriff, in discharging him from office.

The Plaintiff held, and exhibited the High Sheriff's receipt for the arrearages of taxes mentioned in the Bill, including the taxes due by the same persons for 1815, the year the Plaintiff was Deputy; so that he had the most perfect proof of the fact that he had paid the $36 02, both to the High Sheriff, and into the Treasury, and that the High Sheriff was responsible to him for that sum. The Bill alleges, by way of giving jurisdiction to the Court, that "there are certain items in the Plaintiff's account which he cannot substantiate by any other person or evidence, known to him at that time, except by the Answer, and testimony of the Defendant himself, to wit, all the items contained in the exhibit B." These were the items, consisting of taxes to the amount of $82 40, charged to be collected by the High Sheriff, and paid into the Treasury by the Deputy. One item of this was $30, received for a Merchant's license, and for which the High Sheriff gave a receipt, as stated on the face of the exhibit: another was $16 91, paid by the Executor of Wright Southgate, and proved by his deposition. Two items charged in the exhibit, were not received by the High Sheriff, amounting to $29 21; and the other sums being received from third persons, who probably had the Sheriff's receipt, could certainly have been proved, without a discovery from the Defendant. The Plaintiff did not admit, in his Bill, that the 660 *Defendant had any set-offs against his claims, and excepted to every set-off allowed by the Commissioners. So, that there never was a case more clearly proper for a Court of Law, and improper for a Court of Equity, than this. A claim on the part of the Plaintiff, for two sums of money, paid by him for the Defendant both capable of proof in a Court of Law, and no set-offs which could make the accounts at all complicated. So far as this was a Bill for an account, it should have been dismissed, for want of jurisdiction, on the Plaintiff's own showing.

The claim to damages for a breach of contract, merely sounding in damages, was still more unfit for the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity. A Court of Equity can give damages in no case where the party has a clear remedy at law; nor even when he has no such remedy, unless, perhaps, under very peculiar circumstances. Anthony v. Leftwich, 3 Rand. 238. The issue of quantum damnificatus, is a familiar term in the Courts of Equity, but is resorted to chiefly, if not solely, in cases where a party applying for relief against a penalty, it is necessary to ascertain the damages for which the Plaintiff is responsible, and bound to pay, as the condition of the relief sought. Unliquidated damages can never surely be said to be the subject of account. Nor was it necessary to ascertain whether the contract had been violated by the High Sheriff, in order to determine whether he was entitled to charge the Deputy in account with the price stipulated to be paid for the deputation of the office; for, whether the Sheriff was right or wrong in discharging the Deputy, he could not, in equity, claim more of the stipulated price, than a pro rata compensation for the term the Deputy actually enjoyed the office. I think the Decree should be reversed, and the Bill dismissed, with costs.

661 *Lane's Executrix v. Ellzey.

December, 1828.

Chancery Practice—Foreclosure of Mortgage—Usury—Evidence.—If to a Bill brought to foreclose a mortgage, the Defendant pleads Usury, and the Bill itself on its face, and the documents filed with it, present a case of Usury, such as is taken, it is not necessary for the Defendant to take depositions to support his plea. His adversary's Bill supports his plea.

This case has been on two former occasions before the Court of Appeals, and in the brief statement which will be made of it, a reference will be made to those decisions.

Thomazin Ellzey, by Deed of Bargain and Sale, bearing date 9th November, 1799, conveyed to William Lane, a tract of land in Fairfax County, containing four hundred and seventy-five and three-fourth acres, for the consideration of 475l. 15. On the same day William Lane signed an agreement in writing, by which he stipulated that if Ellzey should re-pay him the said sum of 475l. 15, with legal interest on the same, and the rent for the present year (1799,) within, or at the end of six weeks from that day, then that the said Lane would give up to the said Ellzey the said Deed. This agreement was copied and certified to be correct by the said Ellzey.

In 1800, Lane brought a suit in Chancery to foreclose the equity of redemption in the said land, charging that the said Deed, though on the face of it an absolute conveyance, yet when taken in connection with the agreement aforesaid (which he recites) was a mortgage. In May, 1801, the Bill was taken for confessed, and a Decree rendered by default against Ellzey, the Defendant, directing a sale of the land by Commissioners, &c. Before a sale was effected, Ellzey, in March, 1802, filed a Bill of Review, charging that the conveyance was obtained by Lane on an usurious consideration, and praying to be released from the interest. That Bill of Review was dismissed by the Court of Appeals in October, 1808. See 2 Hen. & Munf. 589.

Upon the cause being sent back to the Superior Court of Chancery at Richmond, and William Lane being dead, it

662 *was abated as to him, and in June, 1809, on the motion of Sally Lane, his Executrix, a Subpœna Scire Facias was awarded to revive the suit. The Defendant, Ellzey, on the return of the Sci-

Fa. in February, 1810, tendered a plea of the Statute against Usury, which avers, that from the scope of the Bill originally filed, and from the Deed and agreement referred to as exhibits in the said Bill, the said William Lane exacted of the Defendant a greater compensation for the sum advanced to the Defendant than the legal rate of interest. The Chancellor refused to receive the plea but on certain terms imposed by him: these terms not being complied with, the plea was not received, and an interlocutory Decree was entered at February Term, 1810, for a sale of the land by Commissioners. The land was sold, and the money paid to Lane's Executrix, and on the 6th February, 1811, a final Decree was rendered, confirming the sale, from which Ellzey appealed. In March, 1813, the Court of Appeals decided, that "although the statement made in the Bill may possibly be explained so as to show the transaction not to have been usurious, yet there being strong reasons, from that statement, to believe that the matter of the plea in the proceedings mentioned, may be true, which defence, where it is probably correct, ought at all times to be received in a Court of Equity, (so long as the case is within the power of that Court,) without annexing any unreasonable condition thereto," reversed both the interlocutory Decree of February, 1810, and the final Decree of February, 1811, and remanded the cause to the Court of Chancery, with directions to receive the plea, or such other plea or defence as the party may offer touching the usury of the transaction in the Bill mentioned. 4 Munf. 66.

On its being returned to the Chancery Court, then established at Fredericksburg, the Defendant filed his plea of usury, averring, that on the 9th November, 1799, it was corruptly agreed between William Lane, and Thomazin Ellzey, that the former should lend the latter the sum of 475l. 15s. and that Ellzey should re-pay the principal at the expiration of six weeks, and that for the forbearance of the said principal, the said Ellzey should pay interest at six per cent. per annum from the said 9th November, 1799, and the further sum of 40l., the amount of the rent of the land for that year; and that to secure the payment of the said several sums, the Deed in the Bill mentioned was executed. Issue being taken on the plea, the Court of Chancery, on the 2d May, 1817, sustaining the plea, dismissed the Bill, from which Decree the Plaintiff appealed.

This Bill is filed to foreclose a mortgage. It is stated in the Bill to be a mortgage. If the Bill had averred that Lane had, a year before, purchased and paid for the land, and had then agreed to re-sell it to the Defendant for the sum paid, and the rent of the land for that year, it would have given such explanation of the transaction as would, I presume have required an Answer, such allegation not being so inconsistent with the transaction, as evinced by the writings, but that it might have been averred, and proved. This is not done, but it is merely alleged that the Defendant did not, within, or at the end of six weeks, pay the said sum, (which had before that time been paid to the Defendant for the said land,) with legal interest on the same, and the rent for the year 1799. The interrogatory part of the Bill calls on the Defendant to say whether he did not execute the Deed, (which is a common Deed of Bargain and Sale, without defeasance on its face:) whether the Plaintiff did not pay the said sum of money to his order: and whether he did not consent to the agreement made by the Plaintiff to restore the Deed, 664 on his paying "the said sum with legal interest, and the rent therein mentioned: and whether it was not at his special request that the Plaintiff agreed to the terms of the aforesaid agreement.

The agreement thus referred to, bears equal date with the conveyance and states nothing like a previous sale and a re-sale; but simply that Ellzey having conveyed to Lane four hundred and seventy-five and three-fourth acres of land on that day for 475l. 15s. he (Lane) agreed that if Ellzey, within, or at the end of six weeks, shall pay the said sum with legal interest, and the rent of the present year, then he agrees to give up the Deed.

The plea of usury being filed, it is said that Ellzey must prove the usury.

The Deed shows the parties to be both citizens of Virginia, and the land to lie in the County of Loudoun, so that it cannot be foreign interest.

The sum due for the rent is not stated in the Bill, but the rent, (be it more or less,) is claimed in the Bill. The quantum is not material.

It has been urged though, that the Defendant must prove his plea. This plea was filed at Rules in July, 1814, and in June, 1815, the Defendant was ruled to reply. In May, 1816, there was a general replication. No depositions were taken on either side, and in April, 1817, the cause was set for hearing by the Plaintiff.

It seems to me, that the Bill, and the documents filed with it, present such evidence of usury in support of the plea, that it must be taken as true, unless some explanation, compatible with the pleadings, had been adduced on the other side.

Nothing of this kind is done, though this Court formerly thought some explanation might possibly be given. 4 Munf. 66. No explanation being given, and the case being quite clear for the Defendant, the Decree must be affirmed.

Richard Poindexter v. The Commonwealth.

November, 1828.

Indictment—Verdict—Variance in Name—Effect.—If an indictment charges an offence to have been committed by Richard, and the verdict abridges the name by finding the prisoner Rich'd. guilty, the verdict is not erroneous.

668 Grand Larceny—Indictment—Verdict.—If a person be indicted for grand larceny, and the Jury convict him of petit larceny without ascertaining the value of the goods stolen, the verdict is sufficient.

Same—Verdict—Sufficiency.§—A verdict which does not ascertain what goods were stolen, nor their value, nor whether they are forthcoming, or not, nor what articles are not forthcoming, if any, nor the value of such as are not forthcoming, (but merely finds the prisoner guilty of petit larceny on an indictment for grand larceny,) will not be set aside as erroneous.

This was an application for a Writ of Error to a Judgment of the Superior Court of Law for Patrick County, by which the petitioner was sentenced to be confined in the Jail of that County for the term of two months, there to be kept on low and coarse diet, and at the expiration of his term, to receive fifteen stripes; the prisoner having been convicted of petit larceny.

The application was over-ruled. A statement of the case is to be found in the following opinion of the Court, which was delivered by JUDGE FIELD.

The petitioner was indicted and tried before the Superior Court of Law for Patrick County, for the larceny of certain goods, which were charged in the indictment to be over the value of ten dollars. The Jury found a verdict in these words: "We, the Jury, find the prisoner, Rich'd Poindexter, guilty of petty larceny." The prisoner moved in arrest of Judgment, and filed the following assignment of errors.

"1. Because he says that the verdict of the Jury is not rendered against the prisoner, but against Rich'd Poindexter.

*All of the Judges did not sit in all of the following Cases. Judge Dade was prevented by sickness from attending more than two or three days. JUDGE SEMPLE, with the concurrence of his colleagues, also retired on the fourth day, and JUDGE STUART, with like concurrence, about the seventh. —Note in Original Edition.

†See monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments" appended to Boyle v. Com. 14 Gratt. 674.

‡See monographic note on "Larceny" appended to Johnson v. Com. 24 Gratt. 555.

"2. Because the Indictment charges an offence, which, by the Laws of the land, amounts to grand larceny.

"3. Because the Jury, by their verdict, have not ascertained what goods were stolen, nor the value of the goods stolen, so as to enable the Court to ascertain whether the offence be grand or petit larceny.

"4. Because the Jury have not ascertained whether the goods be forthcoming, or not.

669 "5. Because the verdict does not show what articles are not forthcoming, nor the value, so as to show the Court for what a restitution might be awarded."

The Superior Court over-ruled the prisoner's motion to arrest the Judgment, and sentenced him to imprisonment in the County Jail for the term of two Calendar months, and at the expiration of his term, to receive fifteen lashes.

This Court is of opinion, that the matters alleged in arrest of Judgment, are insufficient for that purpose, and that the Superior Court of Law properly over-ruled the motion. The Writ of Error is, therefore, overruled.

The Commonwealth v. John Booth. §

November, 1828.

Criminal Law—Statute—Assemblage of Slaves on Lot—Proof.—In a prosecution under the last clause of the 18th section of the Act concerning slaves, &c. against a Defendant for permitting a number of slaves, more than five, other than his own, to be and remain on his lot, or tenement, it is not necessary for the Commonwealth to prove that they remained thereon more than four hours at any one time.

Same—Same—Object of Statute.—The object of the first clause of the section is to protect private rights, by preventing persons from knowingly permitting the slaves of others to tarry on their premises without the owner's leave, for an unreasonable time. The object of the last clause, is to guard the public against assemblages, which might be dangerous to the peace, or injurious to morals, in a much shorter time than four hours.

Same—Same—Same—Application.—Qu. Does the last clause of the said section apply to the assemblage of any other negroes, than slaves?

Same—Probata et Allegata—Case at Bar.—The proof must correspond with the allegation, and therefore, if the Information charges an unlawful assemblage of negro slaves, the Commonwealth must prove that they were slaves.

In consequence of a previous Presentment of the Grand Jury, an Information was filed by the Attorney for the Commonwealth in the Superior Court of Law for Norfolk County, against the Defendant; which charged that, on the "first of August, 1827, and on divers other days and times, between that day and the 12th September, in the same year, at the town of Portsmouth, and County aforesaid, 670 charged that, on the "first of August, 1827, and on divers other days and times, between that day and the 12th September, in the same year, at the town of Portsmouth, and County aforesaid, and in, about, and near the shop, and storehouse, and upon the lot and tenement of him the Defendant, he the said Defendant, did knowingly and willfully, permit and suffer unlawful assemblies of negro slaves, more than five, other than his own, that is to say, to the number of twenty negro slaves, then and there to assemble, and meet together, and then and there to drink, tipple, and make a noise, to the great nuisance, annoyance and disturbance of the good citizens of the town and county aforesaid, to the encouragement of dissipation, vice, and immorality, to the evil example of all others in like manner offending, against the form of the Act of Assembly in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the Commonwealth. The Defendant having pleaded the general issue, a trial was had, and the Jury found him guilty, and assessed his fine to $10, subject, however, to the opinion of the Court on the points reserved at the trial.

The question reserved was, whether, under the 13th section of the Act, (1 Rev. Co. ch. 111, p. 424,) entitled, "An Act reducing into one the several Acts, concerning slaves, free negroes and mulattoes," it is not essential for the Commonwealth, in order to convict the Defendant, to prove that the negroes and slaves above the number of five mentioned in the latter part of that section remained on the Defendant's lot, tenement, or plantation, above four hours? And also upon the question, whether it is incumbent on the Commonwealth, after proving that negroes and slaves above the number of five, were assembled on the Defendant's lot, tenement, or plantation, by his knowledge and permission, at one time, also to prove that they were slaves? If either of these questions is decided against the Commonwealth, Judgment is to be entered for the Defendant; otherwise, for the Commonwealth.

671 *The Superior Court adjourned these questions to the General Court, and also on the question, what Judgment on the whole case, the Superior Court ought to render?

PARKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

After stating the case, he proceeded:

The 13th section of the Act referred to, provides, that "if any master, mistress or overseer of a family, merchant, tavern-keeper or any other person, shall knowingly permit or suffer any slave, not belonging to him or her, to be and remain upon his or her plantation, lot or tenement, above four hours at any one time, without leave of the owner or overseer of such slave, he or she, so permitting, shall forfeit and pay three dollars, for every such offence; and every owner or overseer of a plantation, merchant, tavern-keeper, or any other person, who shall so permit or suffer, more than five negroes or slaves, other than his or her own, to be and remain upon his or her plantation or quarter, lot or tenement, at any one time, shall forfeit and pay one dollar, for each negro or slave above that number." The questions arise out of the latter clause of this section.

As to the first question, the Court is of opinion, that it is not necessary for the Commonwealth to prove that the negroes and slaves over the number of five, referred to in that clause, remained above four hours at any one time, on the Defendant's lot or tenement.

If they remained for any period of time however short, it satisfies the words of the Act. The expression "so permit," obviously refers to the knowledge of the Defendant, mentioned in the preceding clause, and not to the time of the negroes or slaves, remaining. It is the same as if the Legislature had said, "And any person who shall so knowingly permit," &c. The expressions "to be, and remain," were intended to obviate the possible construction, (if the words "to be," alone had been 672 used,) that the mere passing *through, or over a lot, or tenement, with the knowledge of the owner, or more than five negroes or slaves, without binding for any purpose whatever, was a violation of the Law.

If the expressions "to be and remain," or "so permit," render it necessary to conviction, that the negroes or slaves, referred to in the last clause of this section, should like those referred to in the first, remain above four hours at any one time, then this absurdity would follow, that if six slaves remained above four hours on a person's lot, tenement or plantation, with his knowledge, and he was prosecuted under the last clause of the section, he could only be fined one dollar, whereas if but one so remained, and he was prosecuted under the first, the fine would be three dollars. In fact, by such a construction, the same meaning is attributed to both clauses of the section, and the only difference would be in the amount of the fine, involving the above absurdity.

In looking to the spirit of the Act, the Court is confirmed in the construction which its words warrant. The first part of the clause is principally intended to protect private rights, by preventing persons from knowingly suffering the slaves of others to tarry on their premises, without leave of the owners, although the offence might not amount to an actual secret harbouring. The last part of it was intended to guard the public against assemblages of negroes, and slaves, equally dangerous to the peace of the community, and destructive of the morals of the persons concerned. In the first case, a remaining for less than four hours, might be considered a slight interference with the owner's rights: in the other, a much shorter period than four hours, would be sufficient to effect every purpose the Law intended to guard against, whether of tipping, committing breaches of the peace, plotting together for illegal purposes, or any other.

As to the second question arising out of the verdict, the Court is clearly of opinion, that as the Information charges 673 *the Defendant with permitting an assemblage of negro slaves, the proof ought to have corresponded with the allegation, and therefore, that it was incumbent on the Commonwealth to prove that the negroes assembled were slaves. Whether such proof would have been necessary, if the Information had pursued the words of the Act of Assembly, this Court does not mean now to decide.

The consequence is, that in answer to the third question, this Court certifies its opinion to the Superior Court of Norfolk County, that upon the whole case, Judgment ought to be rendered for the Defendant.

Terrel Bledsoe v. The Commonwealth.

November, 1828.

Criminal Law—Continuances.*—Under what circumstances a continuance of a Criminal Case ought to not to be granted on the application of the prisoner.

This was an application for a Writ of Error to a Judgment of the Superior Court of Law for Montgomery County, which was overruled.

SMITH J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

It appears by the Record, that at the last September Term of the Superior Court for Montgomery County, the prisoner was indicted for feloniously stealing, taking and carrying away, a negro man slave, of the goods and chattels of one Michael Peterman, of the value of four hundred dollars. Being thereof arraigned, he pleaded not guilty, and put himself on the Country, and thereupon moved the Court for a continuance of the cause, for the reasons set forth in an affidavit filed, and ordered 674 to be made a part of the *Record. In that affidavit, the prisoner swears,

"that he considers that he cannot now safely go to trial, and assigns the following reasons: that he expects by the next Term of this Court, to be enabled to procure the attendance of sundry witnesses from the State of North Carolina, where he resided previous to his arrest, to prove that he is a man of good general character as to honesty, which he cannot prove here, he being a stranger in the country. He also expects to be able to prove at the next Term, that the negro, which he is charged with stealing, was the property of Jonathan Laws; that he regards this evidence as material, because, from the testimony given against him before the Examining Court, the Attorney for the Commonwealth relied principally, on evidence which went to show that the affiant was seen travelling in company with the said Laws, who then had the negro in his possession after the time he was alleged to have been taken from Peterman. The affiant is well satisfied that he can clearly prove, that the said negro, so seen in possession of said Laws, was in fact then the property of said Laws, and had been his property for several years, which fact, if proved, he is advised and believes will be very material to his defence. He also expects to prove that he was in the State of North Carolina at the time the offence is charged to have been committed; which facts he is now unable to prove, because of his recent arrest and confinement in Jail." The motion was overruled by the Court, and the prisoner put on his trial, convicted and sentenced to five years imprisonment in the Penitentiary.

The Writ of Error is asked for on the ground, that the Superior Court erred in over-ruling the motion for a continuance.

A motion for a continuance, is addressed to the sound discretion of the Court; but whether the decision of a Superior Court, on such a motion in a Criminal case, is subject to the revision and correction of this Court, is a question which has never yet been decided here; nor is it necessary now to *decide it, for be that as it may this Court being unanimously of opinion that the affidavit of the prisoner, and the matters therein set forth, were not sufficient to entitle the prisoner, to a continuance of the cause, the Writ of Error must necessarily be refused.

James G. Pinner & al. v. Edwards, Administrator of Price.

Samuel Overfield v. Alexander Handerson.

November, 1828.

Dismissal of Suit—Damages.—The damages of five dollars, given by the Act of Assembly, in case of non-suits, ought to be awarded in all cases of dismissals, and discontinuances, produced by a voluntary abandonment of the cause by the Plaintiff, after the Defendant's appearance, whether in the Office, or in Court, and such dismissals ought to be entered up as non-suits.

Same—Same—Failure to Secure Costs.—But the dismissal of a suit for a failure to give security for costs, is not such a voluntary failure to prosecute, as authorises this Judgment.

Retrait—Damages.—In the case of a Retrait, these damages ought not to be awarded.

The first of these cases was adjourned to this Court by the Superior Court of Law for Surry County. The Plaintiffs appeared by Attorney, and dismissed their suit, which was an action on the case; whereupon the Defendant, by his Counsel, moved the Court to enter a non-suit in the case, and award him five dollars for the same, besides his costs. The Court adjourned to this Court the following question: "Whether the Plaintiff, after an appearance, or issue joined, as in this case, in any action, is entitled to dismiss it without paying to the Defendant, five dollars besides his costs?"

676 *The second case was adjourned by the Superior Court of Wood County. The Defendant, in an action of Covenant, appeared in Court at the April Term, 1828, and on his motion, an order was entered, that, it appearing to the satisfaction of the Court that the Plaintiff was not an inhabitant of this State, the suit be dismissed at the next Term, unless security for the payment of such costs and damages as may be awarded the Defendant, and also of the fees which will become due from the Plaintiff to the officers of the Court, be given with the Clerk within sixty days from this time. At the September Term, 1828, the following entry was made. "This cause having been dismissed for want of security for costs, and the Plaintiff failing to set aside said dismissal by giving such security, the same is confirmed. Therefore, it is considered by the Court, that the cause be dismissed, and the Defendant, by his Attorney, prays Judgment against the Plaintiff for five dollars besides his costs, as and for a non-suit, and the Court being of opinion that the seventy-second section of the "Act for the limitation of actions, &c." ought to be settled by the General Court, adjourns to that Court the following questions: 1st. Ought five dollars damages to be taxed on every Office dismissal, or such only as are entered up as non-suits? 2d. If the Plaintiff dismisses, or discontinues his cause, ought damages to be given as for a non-suit?"

SUMMERS, J. delivered the opinion of this Court.

These cases, presenting questions of practice, arising under the 28th and 72d sections of the "Act for the limitation of actions; for preventing frivolous and vexatious suits: concerning Jeofails, and certain proceedings in civil cases," were considered together.

The seventy-second section, in general terms declares, that "if the Plaintiff shall at any time fail to prosecute his suit, he shall be non-suited, and pay to the Defendant, or Tenant, besides his costs, five 677 dollars." *This provision, justly imposing a penalty on the Plaintiff for vexing his adversary with a suit, which is afterwards abandoned, and giving some remuneration to the Defendant, for the expense and trouble to which he has been exposed, extends, in our opinion, to all cases of a voluntary desertion of the cause by the Plaintiff after the appearance of the Defendant, whether that desertion shall happen in a failure to declare; to answer his adversary in any of the subsequent stages of the cause before issues are formed; or shall be occasioned by the dismissal, or discontinuance of the suit after an appearance, in all which cases, Judgment of non-suit should be entered for the five dollars given by Law.

When the cause is dismissed on failure of the Plaintiff to give security for the costs, a majority of the Court is of opinion, that it is not a voluntary failure to prosecute the suit, but is rather the result of an obstruction to the progress of the cause, occasioned by the act of the Defendant, and which the Plaintiff may not have it in his power to overcome. Another reason for this difference is, that the twenty-eighth section of the Act before referred to, does not in terms require such dismissals to be entered as non-suits and they are not within the reasons of the seventy-second section.

To the rule before adverted to, there will perhaps be found an exception in the case of a Retraxit. There, it is true, that the Plaintiff also voluntarily abandons his cause, but as he goes further, and admits that he has no cause of action, he entitles the Defendant to a Judgment as beneficial to him, as if rendered on a general verdict in his favor. The Court can, therefore, perceive no good reason for giving damages in the one case, which the Law does not warrant in the other. To do so, would be to compel a Plaintiff, willing to submit to a final Judgment in favor of his opponent, to incur the useless expense of impaunelling a Jury, for the sole purpose of avoiding the amercement. A non-suit is not a final disposition of the cause: the 678 *Plaintiff may commence it anew.

A Retraxit is a final disposition of it, and the Plaintiff cannot again commence his action. There is, therefore, good reason why in the former case, the damages should be allowed, and not in the latter.

Jones v. Timberlake.

November, 1828.

Escape Warrant—What It Should Show.—Although an Escape Warrant ought regularly to show on its face that the person who issues it, is a Justice of the Peace, yet, on a Habeas Corpus sued out by the person arrested under it, if it is proved that he is a Justice, the prisoner ought not to be discharged.

On the petition of David Jones, to the General Court, setting forth that the petitioner, a resident of Fluvanna County, having arrived in the City of Richmond, on the 18th November, was arrested on the day following by the Serjeant of the said City, and that he is now illegally detained in the custody of the said Serjeant. A Writ of Habeas Corpus was awarded, directed to the said Serjeant, returnable on the next day. In obedience to the Writ, the Serjeant produced the body of the petitioner, and made return, that he had taken the said Jones into his custody, by virtue of two Escape Warrants, issued by J. Currin, who is said and believed to be a Justice of the Peace for the County of Fluvanna, and he produced the Escape Warrants. The Warrants were dated in 1825. By one of them it appeared, that David Jones was charged in execution at the suit of Timberlake & Magruder, and other creditors named; and by the other, that he was charged in execution at the suit of Thomas Boyd. They were in the usual form, reciting the cause of the prisoner's commitment, and his escape, and were directed to all Sheriffs, 679 Serjeants, &c., *commanding them to seize and re-take the prisoner, and to commit him to prison. The person who issued the Warrants, signed his name J. Currin, without stating himself to be a Justice of the Peace for the County of Fluvanna.

The creditors appeared by Counsel, as well as the debtor. The latter gave in evidence that he was a farmer in Fluvanna, where he resided in 1825, and ever since, without one mile of the residence of the creditors: that he has never concealed himself, and that he has gone at large and been publicly seen at the Court-house, and other public places in Fluvanna, for the last three years, and that he was in the store of the creditors within a few months before his arrest, and that these Warrants have never been executed on him in his own County.

The creditors, proved that the Jail of Fluvanna was consumed by fire in 1826, and has not since been re-built: and that J. Currin was in 1825, and is now a Justice of the Peace in the County of Fluvanna.

Schmidt, for the petitioner, contended: 1. That it ought to appear from the Warrant itself, that it was issued by a Justice of the Peace of the County where the prisoner had been in custody. 1 Rev. Co.

p. 548. That the Court "cannot presume that he is a Justice. 4 Burn's Justice, p. 331. That as the Warrant is the authority for the arrest, it ought to be sufficient of itself to justify the arrest, without extraneous evidence.

"2. That as the Warrant issued in 1825, and the petitioner was seen publicly in his own County, it ought to be presumed that there had been an arrangement of the debt between the parties.

Green, for the creditors, relied: 1. On the fact fully proved, that Currin was, and is a Justice of the Peace for Fluvanna: and that according to the authority of Burn, it is not necessary that the Justice should state himself to be such.

680 "2. He insisted that the presumption of an arrangement of the debt, is repelled by the fact that the Jail of the County was burnt down.

STUART, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

The application of David Jones to be discharged from the custody of the Serjeant, has been considered by the Court. The petitioner was taken on two Escape Warrants issued by James Currin, on the 22d February, 1825. It is objected, that it does not appear on the face of the Warrants, that Currin was a Magistrate. It has also been urged, that the length of time which has intervened, since the date of the Warrants, has raised a presumption that the debt has been discharged.

On the other hand, it has been proved, that Currin was in fact an acting Justice at the date of the Warrants, and that for some time past there has been no Jail in that County.

The Court is of opinion, that although Escape Warrants ought to be issued by Justices of the Peace, and, that regularly, it ought to appear on the face of the Warrants that they are such, yet in this instance, that defect has been supplied by proof of the fact. They are also of opinion, that the want of a Jail repels any presumption arising from the lapse of time. The petitioner is therefore remanded to the custody of the Serjeant of the City.

Note.—The petitioner afterwards applied to the Court of Appeals for a Writ of Error to this Judgment, which that Court refused.—Note in Original Edition.

681 *Samuel Clemmons v. The Commonwealth.

November, 1828.

Statute.—Regulation of Ordinaries.—Construction.—The 13th section of the Act for regulation of Ordinaries, &c. is not to be construed as permitting persons, from the produce of whose estate ardent spirits are made, or Distillers, to retail them, to be drank at the place where sold.

This was an application for a Writ of Error to a Judgment of the Superior Court of Law for Harrison County. The petitioner was indicted for selling, by retail, without having a license therefor, whiskey and other ardent spirits, at his dwelling-house, to be drank at the place where sold. On the trial, he moved the Court to instruct the Jury, that if, from the evidence, they believe that the liquor charged to have been sold by retail by the Defendant, was the produce of the Defendant's own estate, or distilled by him, it was lawful for the Defendant to retail the same, to be drank where sold, without first obtaining a license therefor; which instruction the Court refused to give, and he excepted to that opinion. The Defendant was then found guilty by the Jury, and the Court rendered Judgment against him for the fine of $30, and required him to enter into a recognizance, himself in the sum of $100, and a surety in the same sum, conditioned for his good behaviour for one year; which was done. Act of Assembly (2 Rev. Code, p. 282,) under which he was indicted, is as follows:

"Sec. 8. If any person, without such license," (that is, such as is provided for by the first section,) "shall open a tavern, or sell by retail, wine, rum, or brandy, or other ardent spirits, or a mixture thereof, to be drank in, or at the place where it shall be sold, or in any booth, arbor, or stall, such offense shall be deemed a breach of good behaviour, and he or she, so offending, shall moreover forfeit and pay the sum of thirty dollars, to the use of the Commonwealth, &c."

"Sec. 13. Provided, always, That nothing in this Act shall extend to be construed to prohibit any person or persons from retailing such liquors as shall actually 682 have been made from the produce of such person's own estate, or brewed or distilled by him, her or them, or those in his, her or their employ; nor to prohibit any merchant, or person keeping store for the sale of merchandise, from retailing liquors, so that such liquors be not drank or intended to be drank, at the house or plantation where the same shall be sold."

Duncan, Counsel for the petitioner, sent in a written argument.

He contended, that in order to constitute the offence created by the 8th section, it is not merely necessary that there should be a selling by retail without a license, but that the liquor should be sold "to be drank in, or at the place where sold." Any person may sell liquor by retail without incurring the penalty provided the liquor was not sold to be drank in, or at, the place where sold.

The 13th section was in part intended to create an exception in favor of the grower, and distiller of grain converted into liquor. It certainly could not have been contemplated by the Legislature, by the enactment of the 13th section, that it was only a permission to the grower and distiller to sell their liquors by retail, provided it was not sold to be drank where sold; for, this was a permission which they in common with every person enjoyed under the 8th section: That an exception, exclusively in favor of the grower and distiller, was intended by the 13th section, is manifest; and he contends, that the liquor, (the produce, &c.) may be sold by them to be drank where sold, without incurring the penalty created by the 8th section. If such is not the proper construction of the 13th section, then the grower and distiller are left exactly where the 8th section placed them, and the 14th section is unnecessary and useless. This would be adopting a principle of construction, which the Courts ought to avoid.

The difficulty in construing the Statute, has arisen from the clause in the 13th section relating to merchants, "and the limitation that succeeds it, viz: 'So as such liquors be not drank, or intended to be drank, at the house or plantation where sold.'" It is supposed that the merchant, and the grower and distiller, were to be placed on the same footing, and that the limitation was intended to apply to all of them. That this is not correct, is already shown by the fact, that such a construction would render the 13th section useless, as the persons embraced by it would in that event be in the same condition as if that section had not been enacted.

He contended that, with reference to the grammatical construction of that section, the limitation was intended to operate on the merchants only; and there is good reason for this. The merchants' license permitted sales by retail of goods, wares and merchandises, of foreign and domestic growth, containing no restriction as to the quantity sold, or the use to be made of it. The privilege embraced foreign and domestic liquors: the merchant could, therefore, under his license, sell liquors by retail, to be drank any where. This privilege was, or might be abused: it was an interference with the regular tavern-keeper; to prevent which, and to prevent stores from becoming tippling-houses, and from principles of general policy, and for the revenue, the Legislature deemed it necessary to impose a restriction upon the privileges exercised by the merchants under the merchants' license, and hence the enactment was made, which constitutes a part of the 13th section.

By giving that section the operation here contended for, the grower and distiller have a privilege conferred upon them, which otherwise they would not have, and the privilege of the merchant would be restricted, thus giving an effect to all parts of the section, and that effect entirely consistent with the general provision of the Statute: and we thereby avoid a construction which would declare an entire section of the Law to be utterly useless.

The Court, after a conference on the subject refused the Writ of Error.

684 *SUMMERS, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

Clemmons was indicted for retailing whiskey, and other ardent spirits, and mixtures thereof, to some person to the Jurors unknown, to be drank at the place where sold, without first obtaining a license as prescribed by Law. On the trial of the cause, he moved the Court to instruct the Jury, that, if they were satisfied from the evidence that the liquor charged to have been sold by retail as aforesaid, was the produce of his own estate, or distilled by him, it was lawful for him to retail the same, to be drank where sold, without obtaining a license. This instruction the Court refused to give, and an exception was taken, and this application is to correct the supposed error.

The Counsel of Clemmons insists, that the proviso of the 13th section of the Act regulating Ordinaries, exempts persons retailing ardent spirits made from the produce of the vendor's own estate, or distilled by him, from the prohibitions contained in the eighth section of the same Act, although sold to be drank at the place of sale. Such interpretation would evidently defeat the intention of the Legislature, as deducible from the whole Statute. This proviso was intended to secure to agriculturalists, distillers and merchants, the right of retailing ardent spirits, under the particular circumstances therein mentioned, without being licensed as Ordinary-keepers, provided such sales were not made subservient to the vice of tippling, which it was the object of the Legislature to suppress.

The words, "so as such liquor be not drank at the house or plantation where the same shall be sold," in the thirteenth section, are therefore to be regarded as applying to each description of persons previously enumerated therein. It is contended, that this interpretation renders the entire proviso nugatory, as the Act contains no provisions inhibiting the sale of ardent spirits, not to be drank where sold; but this result is produced by the very terms of the section under consideration, as to merchants, and although somewhat in 685 artificially expressed, does not admit of a different application in favor of the other enumerated classes. This proviso probably had its origin in the abundant caution of the Legislature to prohibit the mischiefs about which they were enacting, and should be left in operation, rather than defeat their clearly expressed objects. Application over-ruled.

Note by the Reporter.—The use of the word "plantation," in the latter part of the thirteenth section, seems to prove that the restriction on the right of retailing liquors therein imposed, is not to be confined to merchants who do not usually live on plantations, but is applicable to farmers, from the produce of whose plantations, whiskey and other ardent spirits are made.

Henry Huffman v. The Commonwealth.

November, 1823.

Forgery*—Remanding for Trial—Indictment for Forgery Procuring Instrument.—If an Examining Court remand to the Superior Court for trial, a prisoner charged with forgery, the prisoner may be indicted in the Superior Court, not only for the forgery, but also for procuring the instrument to be forged, and for acting and assisting in the forgery.

Forgery.—See monographic note on "Forgery and Counterfeiting" appended to Coleman v. Com., 25 Gratt. 665.

Same—Remanding of Examining Court—Indictment.—On this subject, the principal case is cited in Com. v. Adcock, 8 Gratt. 670.

Same—Indictment—Distinct Charges.—There are some cases of felony in which, even though the charges are distinct, the prisoner would not be confounded or the attention of the jury distracted; and in which, therefore, the charges may properly be included in the same indictment and tried together: as, for example, the case of forgery and uttering the same instrument, which are distinct offences, and yet are often charged in different counts of the same indictment. Dowdy v. Com., 9 Gratt. 733 citing the principal case as authority. See principal case also cited in Hausenfluck v. Com., 85 Va. 710, 8 S. E. Rep. 683. See further, monographic note on "Indictments, Informations and Presentments" appended to Boyle v. Com., 14 Gratt. 674.

Same-Same-Same-Sufficiency of.—It is not necessary to set forth in the count, the persons whom the prisoner procured to forge the instrument, or with whom he acted and assisted in the forgery. A general description, in the words of the Statute, is sufficient.

Same-Indictment-Sufficiency of.—An Indictment which charges that the prisoner caused and procured a certain instrument to be forged, and willingly assisted in the forgery, &c. is to be understood as charging that he caused it to be done in his presence, and that he aided, being present, in other words, as charging him as principal in the second degree, and not as accessory. See Rasmick's Case, 2 Virg. Ca. 366.

Same-Examining Court-Indictment.—If an Examining Court remand a prisoner, on a charge of passing a forged note, he may be indicted for passing it, knowing it to be forged.

Indictment-Counts-Sufficiency of.—In a Bill of Indictment with three counts, if in the third count it is omitted to be stated that the Grand Jury "on their oath" present (the first two counts being regular in that respect) the objection is obviated by the fact, that the Record states, that the Grand Jury were sworn in open Court.

Forgery-Evidence-Case at Bar.—A forged paper is passed by a prisoner bearing date in 1828: immediately after, with the knowledge of the holder, the prisoner alters the date to 1827. The Indictment sets forth its tenor, and describes it as dated in 1827. The paper is proper evidence to go to the Jury in support of the Indictment, notwithstanding the proof that it bore date in 1828, when passed.

This was an application for a Writ of Error to a Judgment of the Superior Court of Law for Hampshire County, 686 *whereby the petitioner was sentenced to the Penitentiary for the term of two years, on a conviction of forgery.

From the transcript of the Record filed with the petition of the prisoner, the following statement is extracted. A Court was called and held in the County of Hampshire, in March, 1828, for the examination of the prisoner, upon the charge of having "feloniously forged and counterfeited, and passed a single bill or note, purporting to be a note made by William Duling with his seal thereto affixed, for the sum of fifteen dollars, bearing date the 28th December, 1827, and made payable to Henry Huffman, twelve months after date;" it is charged to have been passed "to a certain William Sherrard." The single bill, and assignment by Huffman to Sherrard, thereon endorsed, are in the following words and figures:

"Twelve months after date I promise to pay Henry Huffman or his assigns, the just and full sum of 15 dollars for value received of him. As witness my hand and seal this 28th day of December, 1827.

"William Duling, (Seal.)"

"March 13th, 1828. I assign the within amount to William Sherrard for value received.

"Henry Huffman."

It was proved before the Court of Examination, as appears from a memorandum of the evidence as recorded, that the said single bill had not been executed by William Duling; that the prisoner carried it to the store of William Sherrard, and there sold it for goods. The transaction on the part of Sherrard, who was not present, was negotiated by Charles Blue, his Clerk in the store. The Court of Examination was of opinion that the prisoner was guilty, and remanded him to Jail to undergo a trial, for the offence with which he stood charged, before the next Superior Court of Law.

At the next Superior Court of Law, the Grand Jury found an Indictment against him containing three counts. The first count charges, that he "feloniously 687 did falsely make, *forge and counterfeited, and did feloniously cause and procure to be falsely made, forged and counterfeited, and feloniously did act and assist in the false making, forging and counterfeiting a certain false writing," &c. describing and setting forth in hæc verba the single bill before-mentioned, and averring it to have been done "to the prejudice of the right, and with intent to injure and defraud the said William Duling." The second count charges, that he "feloniously did utter and publish and employ as true for his own benefit, a certain other false, forged and counterfeited writing," describing again the same single bill, and setting it forth according to its tenor and effect, and charging the intent to have been "to injure and defraud the said William Duling," and averring that the prisoner knew it to be "false, forged, and counterfeited." The third count is the same as the second, except that the intent is alleged therein to have been "to injure and defraud William Sherrard." It is not stated upon the face of this count, as it is in the two preceding, that it was found upon the oath of the Grand Jury.

The prisoner, upon his arraignment, and before pleading, moved the Court to quash each count in the Indictment, because "there is no substantial offence charged, and because the offence charged in the Indictment is variant from the charge for which the prisoner was sent on to be tried by the Examining Court." The motion to quash was over-ruled. The prisoner then pleaded not guilty, and was put on his trial by a Jury.

Upon the trial, the Attorney for the Commonwealth offered in evidence a single bill, corresponding with the one set forth in the Indictment. The prisoner objected to its going in evidence to the Jury. The Court over-ruled his objection, and the prisoner filed a Bill of Exceptions to the opinion of the Court, which states, that on the trial of this Indictment, Charles Blue, a witness in behalf of the Commonwealth, produced a single bill, set forth in the Indictment, and testified, "that 688 on the 13th day of March, 1828, *he was in the employment of William Sherrard, of Hampshire County, in the capacity of clerk in the store of the said Sherrard, who was a merchant; that the prisoner on that day took up sundry goods in the store of said Sherrard, in payment of which, he assigned said paper-writing to William Sherrard; that about half an hour after making the assignment, the witness discovered that the paper-writing was dated in the year 1828; upon which, he stated that circumstance to the prisoner, who remarked to the witness that it had been so dated by William Duling by mistake; and therefore, he, the prisoner, (the said paper-writing being handed to him for that purpose by the witness,) with the assent of the witness, with the pen-knife of the witness, erased the figure 8, and made in lieu thereof, with pen and ink, the figure 7, so as to change the date from 1828 to 1827; and then returned the single bill to the witness. Upon this evidence the prisoner contended, that the instrument had not been properly described in the Indictment, and being variant from the single bill therein set forth, should be therefore excluded from the Jury, which the Court refused.

Samuels, for the petitioner, argued in writing to the following effect:

1. That the motion to quash each count, ought to have been sustained. As to the first count, there was a variance between it and the record of the Examining Court. By the Indictment, the prisoner is charged with three distinct offences: 1st, the forging and counterfeiting; 2d, the causing and procuring the single bill to be falsely forged and counterfeited; and 3d, the acting and assisting in the false forging and counterfeiting the said instrument. But, he was only examined for one of these offences; namely, the forgery. He contended, that the fact of forgery does not ex vi termini include the other two facts: that, the Legislature thought it did not so include them, or they would not have provided separately for the other two 689 offences: *that the fact of forgery may exist in the absence of the other two classes of facts, which shows, that it does not include them. He concluded, that as the prisoner was indicted for a greater number of offences than he had been examined for, the Superior Court had no jurisdiction of these latter offences, and that therefore the first count ought to be quashed.

2. That the first count was defective in itself, in not setting forth the person or persons who the prisoner caused and procured to forge the instrument, and those with whom he willingly acted and assisted in the forgery. The persons ought to have been designated, to enable the prisoner to prepare for his defence, and to plead the Judgments in bar of other prosecutions for the same offences.

3. He contended that the first count confounded principal and accessorial guilt. If the procurers or aiders are present, they are principals in the second degree, but if absent, they are accessories, and must be indicted specifically as such, as is agreed by the General Court, in Rasnick v. The Commonwealth, 2 Virg. Ca. 356. Here the count does not aver either the presence, or the absence of the prisoner at the procuring or aiding the forgery to be done, and it is therefore entirely uncertain whether the prisoner is charged as principal or accessory. For this want of certainty, the count ought to have been quashed. He drew the distinction between this case and Rasnick's. There the prisoner did not demur to the count, nor move to quash it, before plea, but it was on a motion to arrest the Judgment, and the General Court seems to have proceeded on the ground that "after verdict on such Indictment, the count must be understood as charging the procurers and aiders as principals in the second degree." But in this case there was a motion to quash before plea, and the case is to be considered as on demurrer. If it is supposed that the degrees of guilt are to be ascertained by the evidence, such supposition ought not to avail. The Indictment itself ought to set out the offences charged as criminal, 690 *and they should be so charged as to leave nothing to intendment. Whatever the evidence may be, the vice inherent in this count, that it does not inform the prisoner whether he is charged as principal or accessory, ought to overthrow it.

4. He objected to the second and third counts. In the Examining Court he was charged with passing the instrument. He might have passed it without being guilty of any crime, for he may not have known that it was counterfeit. But the second and third counts go further, and charge that he passed it, knowing it to be false, forged and counterfeited. He is therefore indicted for an offence for which he had not been examined, and both counts ought to have been quashed.

5. The third count is defective in another particular. It commences thus: "And the Jurors aforesaid, do further present," omitting the words, "upon their oath aforesaid," and so it is not a valid Presentment.

6. The single bill ought not to have gone in evidence to the Jury. From the Bill of Exceptions, it appears, that the single bill, when it was passed to Blue, the clerk, bore date the 28th December, 1828, a day then yet to come: that after the bill had been passed, and the goods received by the prisoner, and the transaction closed, it was discovered that the bill was dated on that day; this fact was communicated by Blue to the prisoner, and by the consent of Blue, and in his presence, the prisoner erased the figure 8, and inserted 7 in lieu thereof: by this erasure neither Blue nor Sherrard was defrauded. When the single bill was first passed to Blue, it bore date the day before mentioned. It is charged in the Indictment to have been dated on the 28th December, 1827, and is therefore different from the bill as originally passed, and consummated. If the bill was forged by Huffman, it was so done before it was altered, and the paper described in the Indictment is in fact different from the paper as it was when passed to Blue.

691 *FIELD, J., delivered the opinion of the Court.

[After making the statement prefixed to this report, he proceeded.]

In his petition for a Writ of Error, the prisoner contends, that the Superior Court of Law should have quashed each count in the Indictment for the reasons there assigned; and should have quashed the third count for the additional reason of its not appearing upon its face to have been upon the oath of the Grand Jury. He also contends, that the single bill should have been excluded from the Jury, for the reason assigned in the Bill of Exceptions.

The Court has attentively and maturely examined and considered the transcript of the Record in this case, and the written argument of Counsel in the Country, filed in support of the petition, and is of opinion that there is no error in the Record. It is an established general rule, that where an Indictment, as this does, charges an offence in the words of the Statute creating the offence, the Indictment as to the description of the fact is good. In Archbold's Criminal Pleading, p. 188, and in Chitty's Crim. Law, vol. 3, p. 1,049, may be found the form of an Indictment upon the English Statute of Forgery of 52 Geo. 3, ch. 138, which our Statute on the same subject resembles. It charges, that the prisoner "feloniously did falsely make, forge and counterfeit, and did cause, and procure to be falsely made, forged and counterfeited, and did willingly act and assist in the false making, forging, and counterfeiting, &c.;" with which form, the Indictment in this case corresponds.

The only seeming difficulty upon this point, arose from the Act of Assembly in relation to Courts of Examination, which secures to the prisoner the right of being examined, upon a charge of felony, by a Court of Examination, composed of five or more of the Justices of the County Court, before he shall be indicted and tried for the alleged crime in the Superior Court of Law. The first count of the 692 *Indictment in this case, charges inter alia, that the prisoner caused, and procured the forgery to be committed. In the Court of Examination, he was charged with having "feloniously forged, counterfeited, and passed," the single bill in question, which the prisoner contends, does not embrace the accessorial offence of causing and procuring a forgery to be committed by another person. If it were conceded that the charge which was made against the prisoner before the Court of Examination, and upon which he was examined, is not sufficiently comprehensive to embrace a case of accessorial guilt, properly so called, as where one man, being himself absent at the time, causes and procures another to make a forged writing, which at Common Law would constitute the absent procurer an accessory before the fact, still there would be no weight in this objection. The "causing and procuring," charged in the Indictment, contemplates a causing and procuring the forgery to be committed by some other person in the presence of the prisoner, which would render him a principal felon in the second degree, and consequently proof of accessorial guilt could not have been received upon the trial.

In looking into the Record of a trial before a Court of Examination, to see for what offence a prisoner has been examined, the Court should regard the substance of the offence, and not the manner in which it may have been perpetrated; nor should the offence be required to be described there with technical precision. The offence charged against the prisoner, and which was examined into by the Court of Examination, was forgery. Whether that offence was committed by the prisoner alone with his own hands; whether he caused and procured it to be done by another, or acted and assisted in the commission of the fact, were incidental enquiries. And whatever may have been the proof relative to the main charge of forgery, it was the duty of the Examining Court, if they thought the prisoner ought not to be discharged from further prosecution, to send him on for further trial in the Superior Court of 693 Law. *without undertaking to discriminate as to the grade of the offence, or to designate the mode in which it had been committed. Upon these principles, the Court of Examination acted in this case; and it was competent for the Prosecuting Attorney to prefer against the prisoner such an Indictment as has been found.

As to the objection taken to the third count, of its not appearing on the face of it to have been found upon the oath of the Grand Jury, that difficulty is obviated by the fact of the Grand Jury's having been actually sworn in open Court, before the Indictment was found, as appears from the transcript of the Record filed with the petition; and therefore, the whole Indictment must necessarily have been found upon the oath of the Grand Jury.

The only remaining objection to be considered, is that which arises from the Bill of Exceptions. If the single bill therein mentioned, were in its original form a forged writing, it did not cease to be so, by the alteration in the date of the year, as mentioned in the Bill of Exceptions. And if it were in either shape a forged writing, as it corresponded in tenor and effect with the single bill described and set forth in each count of the Indictment, there was no cause shown for excluding it from the Jury. The Writ of Error is refused.

Leigh, for the Defendant.

DANIEL, J., delivered the opinion of the Court.

This is an adjourned case from the Superior Court of Law of the County of Chesterfield, from which it appears that the Defendant was presented on the sixth day of June, in the year 1826, by a grand Jury upon their oath, "for keeping and exhibiting a gaming table commonly called 695 *Blind-hazard, alias Hap-hazard, being a table of like nature or kind, with a Faro Bank, &c., at the muster ground, on the premises of a certain Dickerson Wills, situate in the County aforesaid, on a muster-day and within six months (then) last past."

On this Presentment of the Grand Jury, an Information was regularly filed, which charged (besides having two other counts not necessary to be particularly noticed,) "that the said Dickerson Wyatt, of the County of Chesterfield, on the 8th April, 1826, with force and arms, at the house of one Dickerson Wills, in the County aforesaid, unlawfully, wilfully, and wickedly did keep and exhibit a certain unlawful gaming table called Hap-hazard, otherwise called Blind-hazard, otherwise called Snickup, otherwise called Sweat, being a gaming table of the same, or like kind with Faro Bank, whereon and whereat divers persons did then and there, together with the said Dickerson Wyatt, the keeper thereof, unlawfully, wickedly, and wilfully play, and the games then and there played thereon, being games played with cards," &c. The Defendant pleaded not guilty. The Jury returned a verdict: "We of the Jury, find the Defendant guilty, but ignorantly so, he not knowing at the time that the Law embraced this case, and do therefore recommend him to the mercy of the Court." And thereupon, the Defendant moved the Court for a new trial, and afterwards, submitted, in addition, a motion "to arrest the Judgment, because the matter stated in the Information warrants no Judgment against the Defendant, or at most, a Judgment for a fine of twenty dollars only." Upon this state of the case, the Judge of the Superior Court of Law, with the consent of the Defendant, adjourned for novelty, and difficulty, to the General Court, the following questions: "1st. Is the offence charged in the Information, a violation of the 19th section of the Act to prevent unlawful gaming, in the first volume of the Revised Code, p. 567? 2d. Do the facts prove to the Jury, amount in Law, to a violation of the 696 *said section of the said Act?

3d. What Judgment or Order should be made or given in this case?" And by consent, a statement of the case, made in writing, and signed by the Judge, is made a part of the Record in this case, and to be regarded as if spread at large upon the motion for a new trial. The statement is as follows: "On the trial of this case, the evidence proved that the Defendant exhibited the game charged in the Information, at the time and place charged. The game played with cards in the following manner. The exhibitor seated himself at a table with a pack of cards, showing at the same time a small stake of cash on the corner of the table by him; he then, in the presence of those surrounding the table, (inclined to bet) cut the cards off the pack into an indifferent number of parcels, and every one who chose to adventure, pointed out to the dealer or cutter, the parcel on which he should stand; the wager was, that the bottom card of the player's parcel is higher than that of the dealer's parcel, the dealer having the advantage of winning on equal cards. The game of Faro Bank was described by the evidence, and the Court instructed the Jury that the question whether the game was one of a like nature, or kind with Faro Bank, was a question of fact for them to decide, but however strong the resemblance might in other respects be, if the game in question is not one usually resorted to for the sake of gain, it did not come within the meaning of the Act under which the Defendant is prosecuted, but if the resemblance is in both particulars proved to the Jury, the Defendant should be found guilty. The evidence fully proved the exhibition in this case to have been for the sake of gain, and the game itself may be fairly termed one of the numerous expedients resorted to at public places for obtaining money, by inducing others to bet at unequal games; though as proved in this case, had been often publicly and openly played by men of good character, and not professed gamblers, and sometimes exhibited merely to gratify curiosity, this particular game being 697 one of the *lower order, calculated to win money in very small sums generally."

The instructions which were thus given by the Court to the Jury, cannot be complained of by the Defendant. Perhaps they are more favorable to him than the Law would strictly warrant.

The first and second questions propounded in reference to the nineteenth section of the Act of the General Assembly to prevent unlawful gaming, show evidently a mistake; perhaps it is a clerical mistake. Those questions become immaterial in this case, and therefore require no further notice, because the motions to arrest the Judgment, and for a new trial, (together with the approval in Huff v. Com., 14 Gratt. 650; Nuckolls v. Com., 32 Gratt. 895.

with the statement made part of the Record,) and the third question referred to this Court, bring up the whole subject of Law which affects the case. The third question is, "what Judgment or Order should be made or given in this case?"

To answer this question, this Court must enquire what is the Law? What is the offence charged in the Information, and of which the Defendant stands convicted by the Jury? Was the Jury authorised, from the evidence set forth, to find the Defendant guilty of that offence? What punishment, if any, is prescribed by Law for the offence described in the Information?

With respect to the first branch of this enquiry, we find in the 1st vol. Rev. Co. ch. 148, § 17, that "every keeper or exhibitor of any of the tables commonly called A. B. C. or E. O. tables, or Faro Bank, or any other gaming table of the same, or like kind, under any denomination whatsoever, or whether the same be played with cards or dice, or in any other manner whatsoever, shall, upon conviction, be sentenced to hard labour, and imprisonment in the Public Jail and Penitentiary-house, for any period of time, not less than one, nor more than two years," &c.

As to the second branch of the enquiry, we find from the Information, that the Defendant is charged, that he "did keep and exhibit a certain unlawful gaming table, called *Hap-hazard, otherwise called Blind-hazard, otherwise called Snickup, otherwise called Sweat, being a gaming table of the same or like kind with Faro Bank," &c.; and this charge so set forth in the Information, the Jury by their verdict have said is true. And this brings up the third branch of the enquiry: Does the evidence warrant the finding of the Jury? This Court taking the evidence as set forth by the Judge before whom the cause was tried, can see no just grounds upon which the Jury could have found a verdict in favor of the Defendant.

The last branch of the enquiry is, what punishment, if any, is prescribed by Law for the offence described in the Information, and of which offence the Defendant is found guilty?

In the Act of the General Assembly, already quoted, it is seen, that that Act prescribes that the person convicted shall "be sentenced to hard labour, and imprisonment in the Public Jail and Penitentiary-house, for a period of time not less than one nor more than two years." But there is a subsequent Act of Assembly, which passed 21st February, 1823, further to amend the Penal Laws of the Commonwealth, which prescribes, in § 1, "that henceforth when any person shall be convicted of any crime, or offence, now punishable by imprisonment in the Public Jail and Penitentiary-house, for a period not exceeding two years, such person shall, instead of the punishment now prescribed by Law, undergo imprisonment in the Jail of the County or Corporation where such conviction shall take place, for a period not more than six months nor less than one month, at the discretion of the Court, and be there kept on low and coarse diet, as prescribed by the Law for Convicts in the Penitentiary, and shall moreover be punished with stripes, at the discretion of the Court, to be inflicted at one time, or at different times during such confinement, as such Court may direct, provided the same do not exceed thirty-nine at any one time," &c. Sess. Acts of 1822, ch. 32, § 1.

The punishment, therefore, to be inflicted on the Defendant *by the Judgment of the Superior Court of Law of the County of Chesterfield, must be in conformity to the Act of Assembly last recited, if this Court shall so direct in answer to the question, "What Judgment or Order should be made or given in this case?" For, although this last Law is now happily repealed by the Act of 1827, ch. 36, § 4, as to all offences of the character now under consideration, which may have been committed since the date of the repealing Act, yet it is still in force as to offences previously committed.

This brings up fairly the main question, what Judgment shall be given in this case? and opens the way for the consideration of all the arguments which have been so ably, and earnestly urged before this Court, in opposition to rendering any Judgment against the Defendant under this prosecution.

The arguments of the Defendant, made by his Counsel, rest mainly upon two propositions. The first is, that the Law applicable to this case, to be deduced from the several Acts of the General Assembly, would be unconstitutional.

The second is, that the provisions of the Act, by which the offence stated in the Information is supposed to be designated, are too vague and uncertain to be made applicable to any but the three enumerated games of A. B. C. and E. O. and Faro Bank, and therefore Judgment ought to be given for the Defendant.

The first proposition involves a question of the greater magnitude, which should never be lightly and unnecessarily introduced into the deliberations of this Court. Whether this Court has authority to declare an Act of the General Assembly to be unconstitutional, and therefore void, is a question which admits of a great variety of opinion. Judicially to assert or to deny such authority, unless upon an occasion which palpably required such an opinion by the Court, would expose it to the censure of all, without calling to its support the talents and influence of those who might concur in the principle asserted, if such principle *were palpably applicable to the case decided. This Court therefore declines the discussion, not because it would not firmly meet it if a palpable case were to require it, but because the case now under consideration does not require it, further than the notice now to be taken of it.

It is urged that the Act of 1823, already referred to, while it properly limits the authority of the Court to a reasonable extent of punishment to be inflicted on the party convicted, by imprisonment not less than one nor more than six months, yet authorises the Court to inflict the lightest punishment by stripes imaginable, or the most cruel, even necessarily extending to death itself, for an offence of the same character and grade. For that, as the Court may impose an imprisonment for six months, and may also direct the party imprisoned to receive any number of stripes, at different times, not exceeding thirty-nine at any one time, during his confinement, at the discretion of the Court, it is perfectly evident that the Court, by virtue of this Law, might exercise its discretion to subserve vindictive passions, and so as to direct the party convicted to be subjected to thirty-nine stripes every day of the six months, which would inevitably terminate in death; a death produced by the most cruel torture. That by the Bill of Rights, properly regarded as part of the Constitution of Virginia, the General Assembly is restrained from authorising by Law, "cruel and unusual punishments (to be) inflicted," and that therefore the authority delegated to the Courts, as above described by the Act aforesaid, being prohibited to the Legislature, by the Constitution, cannot by it be delegated to the Courts, and that the Act aforesaid is therefore void, and ought so to be regarded by this Court.

It may be allowed, that the Act in question might be regarded as less objectionable, if the aggregate number of stripes, which might be inflicted for any one offence, had been limited as the term of imprisonment is; but this imperfection, if one, does not involve the consequences contended for, nor is it allowed that the discretion of the Court mentioned 701 "in the Act, can rightfully be regarded as unlimited. The responsibility of the Court might have been lighter, if the Act had been more cautiously dictated; but in all cases, where by Law, whether Statute or Common Law, a subject is referred to the discretion of the Court, that must be regarded as a sound discretion, to be exercised according to the circumstances of each particular case. If the Judge should not so limit the authority of his discretion, but extend it further to subserve motives of oppression, or his own vindictive passions, he might and would be impeached. The punishment of offences by stripes is certainly odious, but cannot be said to be unusual. This Court, regarding the discretion delegated by the Act in question, as being of the same character with the discretion always exercised by Common Law Courts to inflict fine and imprisonment, and subject to be restrained by the same considerations, does not feel itself at liberty in this case to refuse to obey the Legislative will, nor to execute that will by its Judgments.

The second proposition, which is, that the act charged in the Information is not sufficiently designated by the terms of the Law in question, as an offence, and therefore, for want of certainty, ought not to be subjected to the penalties prescribed against the games of A. B. C., E. O. or Faro Bank, remains to be considered. The Jury have found the Defendant guilty of keeping and exhibiting a gaming table "of the same or like kind with Faro Bank;" and the evidence upon which the verdict was rendered, is stated, which proves the gaming as charged in the Information and states also the manner in which the game is played, and the chances in favour of the keeper or exhibitor of the table; and the question to be decided by this Court is of a mixed character, depending upon the terms, "same or like kind," and whether the game described by the evidence, is a game of the same or like kind with Faro Bank?

702 "The words of the seventeenth section of the Act of Assembly, which affects this subject, have been already recited. That section enumerates the games of A. B. C. and E. O. and Faro Bank, as games prohibited, and subject to penalties, and making the distinctive characters of those games as the standard and example of the kind of game prohibited, subjects all games of the same or like kind, to like penalty and prohibition. Before we can say that the game described in the Information, is of the same or like kind with those enumerated in the Act, it is necessary to settle some notion of the kind or class of gaming to which the latter belong. This Court is not advised that there is, or can exist but two kinds or classes of games of chance. The first is, where the chances are equal all other things being equal. The second is, where all other things being equal, the chances are nevertheless unequal, that is, in favor of one side. The standard games enumerated, so far as they are understood by this Court, are of the second class, and in all three of them the chances are in favor of the exhibitor of the game or table. Now, the playing charged in the Information, is at a game, which by the evidence is proved to be a game wherein the chances are unequal, and in favor of the exhibitor of the table. It must, therefore, belong to the same class, and be of the like kind of gaming to which the enumerated games belong. The advantages or chances in favor of the player or exhibitor of the table, are not the same in each case, but in each case the chances are in his favor; and this is the distinctive character which marks them as games "of the same or like kind;" and when of the same or like kind, as classed above, it matters not by what denomination they are distinguished, nor whether they are played with cards, or dice, or in any other manner whatsoever. All such games, when played or exhibited lucri causa, are prohibited by the Act under consideration, and subject to the penalties prescribed; but, if exhibited and played, nor for the purposes of gain, they may, or may not be offences 703 "against the General Law prohibiting gaming at cards, &c., according to circumstances.

The following is to be entered as the Judgment of the Court.
This Court is of opinion, and doth decide, that the motion in arrest of Judgment, and also the motion for a new trial, ought to be over-ruled, and that Judgment should be rendered against the Defendant, of imprisonment and stripes, according to Law.

704 Robert Mendum v. The Commonwealth.

November, 1828.

Criminal Law—Third Term after Commitment—Statute—Construction—Case at Bar.—A prisoner is committed for examination, two days before the regular Court of the County in December, but the Examining Court is called to meet seven days thereafter: it falls to meet, and the Examining Court stands adjourned till the regular Court in January: by that Court the case is continued till the February Term, and by that Court till March, without the application of the prisoner, when the examination takes place, and the prisoner is remanded for trial:—Within the meaning of the proviso to §6, ch. 169, 1 Rev. Co. the January Court was the first, and the March Court the third, after his commitment.

Same—Continuance—Absent Witness—Affidavit May Be Required.—Under particular circumstances, a Court may require that the affidavit of an absent witness, setting forth his testimony, shall be produced as the ground-work of a continuance: and the refusal to grant a continuance, (even though the prisoner swears to the materiality of the witness, and specifies what he expects to prove by that witness, and due diligence has been used, and the witness is too sick to attend) will be justified by that Appellate Court under those circumstances.

Evidence—Expert.—When the opinion of an expert is offered in evidence, and it is objected to, because he is not an expert, the Court may hear evidence to ascertain whether he is so, or not, and on being satisfied that he is an expert, may allow his opinion to be given in evidence.

Same—Minute and Remote Circumstances.—For a case in which it is proper to allow minute and remote circumstances to be given in evidence, see the second Bill of Exceptions during the trial.

Criminal Law—Evidence—Confession.—If the Prosecutor for the Commonwealth, on the examination of the prisoner in the Examining Court, give in evidence the confession of the prisoner, but on the trial before the Superior Court, he does not give that confession in evidence, it is not competent for the prisoner to prove what the Commonwealth had proved in the other Court, touching the said confession.

Same—Testimony of Witness in Examining Court.—If the Commonwealth introduce a witness on the trial, who gives his evidence, it is not competent for the prisoner to prove what another witness of the Commonwealth swore to in the Examining Court, that other witness not being a †Criminal Law—Third Term of the Commitment—Statute—Construction.—In Kemp v. Com., 18 Gratt 975, it is said: "The other ground of the motion to quash is, that the commitment, as shown by the certificate of the justice, was made on the 18th of Dec., 1866, and that the examination was had by the county court, at a regular term held on the same day. This objection is based on the authority of Mendum's Case, 6 Rand. 704. That decision, however, was made under the law as it stood in the revised Code of 1819, and has no application to the provision of the present Code. By the Code of 1819, ch. 169, the committing justice was required to issue his warrant summoning the justices to meet for the examination of the fact, on a certain day not less than five, nor more than ten days after the date of the warrant. If the justices failed to meet, the examination stood adjourned to the next regular term of the county court. The court might continue the examination from term to term, provided such continuance, unless on the application of the prisoner, should not be beyond the third term after his commitment for examination. Mendum was committed two days before the December term. The examining court was called to meet seven days after the December court day. It failed to meet, and so stood adjourned to the January term. The general court held, that the January term was to be counted as the first term after the commitment, so that the examination at the March term was regular. This, of course, involved a decision that the examination could not regularly have been had at the December term; and obviously it could not, because five days did not intervene between the day of the commitment and December court day, and also because an examination could not be had at a regular term, unless the called court failed to meet, or adjourned to the regular term."

witness in this case, nor summoned, though living in the adjoining County.

Superior Court—Duration of Term.—A Judgment is rendered in the Superior Court of Chesterfield, on the 15th November, the day on which the General Court is directed by Law to be held at the Capitol: the distance is judicially known to be not more than three hours moderate ride from one place to the other. It does not appear on the Record but that the Judgment might have been rendered in time to enable the Judge to close that Court, and attend at the Capitol to his duties as one of the General Court, on the same day.—The Superior Court of Chesterfield had jurisdiction to render the Judgment on that day.

The prisoner was indicted in the Superior Court of Law for the County of Powhatan, for the murder of Elbert Mosby.

The first count charged the murder to 705 have been *committed by means of a dirk, by which a mortal stab in the left side was given; the second count charged that it was done by a horseman's pistol, by which divers mortal wounds and blows were inflicted on the head of the deceased; the third count charged that the offence was committed by means of a club.

The prisoner was arraigned at the Superior Court of Powhatan, on the 13th May, 1828, and before pleading, moved the Court to quash the Indictment against him, on the ground that his examination before the County Court had not been regular and legal, and he produced the Record of the Examining Court in support of his motion. The following is a brief history of the proceedings before that Court.

The Examining Court first met on the 17th January, 1828, and on the motion of the prisoner, and because some of his witnesses were absent, the case was continued till the 18th, and on that day, for the same cause, it was continued till the 19th, and on that day, on the same motion, and for the same cause, it was continued till the next Court.

On the 20th February, the Court again assembled, and on the prisoner's motion, §Courts—Duration of Term.—The law has fixed no limit to the terms of the circuit superior court, except that the judge holding the court shall adjourn in time to hold the next court in his circuit at the time appointed by law. And the judge may continue the session of his court until the latest period which will allow him time to get to the next court by 4 o'clock P. M. of the third day of the term. Hill v. Com., 2 Gratt. 595, 613, 627, citing the principal case to sustain the proposition. And in the absence of proof to the contrary, it must be presumed that there was sufficient time after the entering of judgment, for the judge of a circuit to have reached the courthouse of an adjoining county, by the ordinary course of travel, before 4 o'clock, p. m. on the third day after the period fixed by law for the term to commence. Boice v. State, 1 W. Va. 333, citing principal case to the point. On the same subject the principal case is cited in Whiteford v. Com., 6 Rand. 725; Brown v. Hume, 16 Gratt. 468. Same—Jury—Custody of Sheriff—What Record Must Show—Oath of Sheriff.—The Sheriff is ex officio bound to keep the jury when adjourned in a criminal case, and it is not indispensably necessary that he should be sworn; but if it were necessary to swear him, it would be presumed that he was sworn, in a case where the record does not show the contrary. Bennett v. Com., 8 Leigh 745, 752, citing the principal case to the point. To the same effect, the principal case is cited in Barnes' Case, 92 Va. 807, 23 S. E. Rep. 784. and for the same cause, the examination was postponed till the 21st. On that day, the prisoner moved to continue the cause till the next Court, and in support of his motion, produced a Subpoena for fifteen witnesses, and another Subpoena directed to the Sheriff of Amelia, directing him to summon three other witnesses, William Milestone, Thomas Carsley, and Polly A. Carsley, and the prisoner swore that these three witnesses were material; that he could not prove by any other what he expected to prove by them, and that he could not go safely to trial without them. It appeared, however, that the Subpoena had not been taken out of the Office, nor applied for by the prisoner, or any person for him. The Court refused to continue the case till the next Term, but did postpone it till the next day. On the 22d, the 706 prisoner again moved for a continuance till the next Term, and produced a Subpoena directed to the Sheriff of Cumberland, commanding him to summon eight witnesses. It was executed on all but one. He swore to the materiality of two of the witnesses so summoned, and one not named. The Court refused to continue it, there being present fifty-four witnesses on the part of the Commonwealth, and twenty-two on the part of the prisoner, and proceeded to the examination, and after some progress, adjourned till the 23d, and then till Monday, the 25th, on which day, one of the Justices being sick, the further examination was necessarily deferred till the next Term.

On the 19th March the Court again met. The prisoner again moved for a continuance till the then next Term, on account of the absence of four witnesses, who do not appear to be any of those mentioned in the preceding motions. The motion was over-ruled, and on that day, and on the 20th and 21st March, proceeded with the examination of the witnesses for the Commonwealth. After that evidence closed, the prisoner again applied for a continuance till the April Term, because of the absence of the witnesses mentioned by him on the 19th. Those witnesses had been summoned, and did not attend, but the prisoner had not applied for any other process to coerce their attendance. The Court over-ruled the application, and the prisoner not calling any witnesses to be examined, the Court remanded him for trial to the Superior Court of Powhatan.

It appeared that the Warrant of Commitment was dated the 18th December; that the regular County Court of Powhatan sat on the 20th; and that the Examining Court was called to meet on the 27th of December; it did not meet on that day, and stood adjourned by Law till the regular Term in January. The Act of Assembly authorises the County Court to continue the examination from Term to Term, "provided, that such continuance, unless on the application of the prisoner, shall not be beyond the third Term after he shall have been committed for examination." The objection made by the prisoner to the regularity of the Examining mitment, and the February Term the third, and that it was not on his application that it was continued beyond the third Term. The Superior Court decided that the December Term was not the first. That Court had no cognizance, either to examine or continue the examination, having been held within less than five days after his commitment, and, therefore, according to the express directions of the Act, had no jurisdiction of the case; and that the January Court was the first Court, after his commitment, that could take cognizance of the case, and the March Court the third. The motion to quash the Indictment was, therefore, over-ruled.

The prisoner then pleaded to the Indictment, and was put on his trial. But, the venire being all challenged for cause, and the bystanders who were summoned, being also challenged for cause, and the Court, satisfied that an impartial Jury could not be had, ordered that the trial of the prisoner should be changed to the Superior Court of Chesterfield.

On the 5th of June, 1828, the prisoner was brought before the last mentioned Court, and on his motion, the trial was continued till the then next Term.

On the 8th November, 1828, the prisoner was led to the Bar, and applied to the Court for a continuance till the next Term, which was refused, and the prisoner excepted. The Bill of Exceptions sets out a Subpoena for Polly A. Carsley, which was returned executed by the Sheriff of Powhatan. The prisoner also swore to her materiality, and her absence. The Court required him to state what he expected to prove by her, and in conformity to that requisition, he stated that he expected to prove by her, that she was present at the prisoner's house on Friday the 7th December, 1827, the day previous to the night on which Elbert Mosby was killed, and that she saw the prisoner's wife then dressing the wound on the breast of the prisoner:

708 he also introduced a witness who proved that she heard the *absent witness, Polly A. Carsley, say that she was at the prisoner's house on Friday the 7th December, 1827, and that she then saw the wife of the prisoner taking fur from a hat which the wife of the prisoner said she was going to apply to a wound on the prisoner's breast. It was proved, to the satisfaction of the Court, that the absent witness, Polly A. Carsley, was too sick to attend Court, without danger to her life. The Court overruled the motion, and ruled the prisoner into trial, because the prosecution was continued on the prisoner's motion at the last Term; at which time, although the nature of the accusation, the enormous expense of the prosecution, together with the fact, that at the Examining Court none of his witnesses had been examined, and the necessity of a change of venue in this case, admonished the Court against lending too willing an ear to the prisoner's motions for continuances; yet, the Court, without requiring him to disclose any of the facts of his defence, granted the continuance, but at the same time, the Court admonished the prisoner, that upon a second motion of the same kind, the affidavit of the witness, on account of whose absence the motion should be made, must, if practicable, be produced, that the Court might judge of the materiality of the witness: and because as the ill health of the witness, who is the daughter of the prisoner, has been of some considerable duration, the husband of the witness who gave evidence of what might probably be the evidence of the said absent witness, being the son-in-law of the prisoner, and an active and intelligent man, and apparently zealously engaged in preparing the prisoner's defence, could easily have taken the affidavit of the said witness: and because, there being upwards of thirty witnesses summoned for the prisoner, it is the opinion of the Court that every probability is against the future attendance of many of said witnesses, who are now in attendance on the Court.

Before the panel of the Jury was completed, one Daniel Chalkley was called as a venire-man, and being sworn to 709 *answer questions, said that he had never heard any detailed account of the evidence that had been, or would be, adduced against the prisoner; that he had heard nothing more than that the prisoner had been charged with killing a man, and that the impression made on his mind was, that if guilty, he should be punished, but if not, that he should be acquitted. On cross-examination, he said he had an impression on his mind, made by what he had heard, and that he did not know, if sworn on the Jury, that he should be able to render a verdict in the cause free of influence from the impression now and heretofore existing on his mind; but, on further examination, he stated that the impression on his mind, and which he thinks will remain, is as to what ought to be done with persons guilty of such offences, and not whether the prisoner is guilty or not; saying also, that he felt prepared to hear the evidence, and to decide the case by it. The prisoner challenged the said venire-man for cause, but the challenge was over-ruled by the Court, and the prisoner subjected to the necessity of challenging him peremptorily, or of being tried by him; to which opinion of the Court, the prisoner excepted. The venire-man was challenged peremptorily.

During the trial, the prisoner filed four several Bills of Exceptions to the opinions of the Court, which are as follows:

The first Bill states, that Doctor Abner Crump was introduced as a witness to prove the appearance of the dead body of Elbert Mosby, and the wounds upon the body, who, in describing the wounds, stated that he was of opinion that some of them, which he examined on the body of the said Mosby, has been made with a dirk, especially one on the side. The Counsel for the prisoner objected to the opinion of the witness being given in evidence to the Jury, upon the ground that the witness did not possess such a degree of skill and experience as a Surgeon, as to entitle his opinion to the weight of evidence. This objection required evidence to be geon. It was proved by himself and others, that he was a regular graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, at which institution, ample means of practical instruction in Surgery existed, when Doctor Crump graduated: that he practised Surgery and Medicine ever since he graduated, now about seventeen years; about five years in Manchester, and the rest of the time in Powhatan County: that cases of Surgery are not so frequent in the Country as in the City practice, but that he has been called on to perform Surgical operations, and has performed them without the aid of others, and has been sometimes called to the aid of others in the performance of Surgical operations. He admitted, that he had not been called on to amputate a leg, or an arm, or to perform any operation for a calculus in the bladder; and he could not say whether he had performed three Surgical operations in the course of a year since he graduated: that he had frequently been called on to examine injuries to the human body, in cases in which no Surgical operation was required: and it was proved, that he stood high as a Physician in his neighborhood, and that he would be confided in as a Surgeon by the people: and it was also testified by Doctor Archer, that from the standing and character of Doctor Crump, he is equal as a Surgeon to any Medical man in the County, who has attended only to the cases arising within the range of his own practice. The witness, Crump, also stated, that from his general acquaintance with the human body, and his knowledge of the practice and principles of Surgery, he entertained no doubt that he could form a correct opinion as to the difference between wounds made with a knife or dirk by stabbing, although he had no recollection that he had ever seen and inspected a wound made by a stab with a dirk or knife. The Court over-ruled the objection to the competency of the said evidence, and permitted the opinion of the witness to be given to the Jury as evidence, and the prisoner excepted.

711 *The second Bill of Exceptions states, that on the trial, Henry Flournoy was introduced as a witness by the Commonwealth, who proved that some two or three days before the Fall Term of the Superior Court of Powhatan, in the year 1827, the prisoner lent to the witness a dirk, which, on the first day of the said Superior Court, he returned to the prisoner: the dirk he has never had since. The Commonwealth then introduced a witness, John Seayres, who proved that a dirk, which he verily believes, to be the one now exhibited in Court, from the general appearance of the dirk, was found by the witness, without the cap now on it, under the boxing to the stable of Robert Mosby, on Monday morning, after breakfast, of the 10th December, 1827, which stable is about — yards from the place at which Elbert Mosby's dead body was found, and about — yards from the house where Robert Mosby now lives, and where Elbert Mosby did live. There was no appearance of blood on the said dirk. The Commonwealth further proved by the said Henry Flournoy, that the dirk lent by the prisoner to him, had a metallick handle, and was the only one he ever saw; and he remembered, before he saw the dirk now produced in Court, that the one which he had borrowed, had upon the handle the letters J. C. or J. H., but did not remember which. The witness being asked, said he did not know the dirk, either with or without the cap, to be the dirk he had borrowed from the prisoner, except from its general appearance, and cannot say that the dirk now produced in Court is the same he borrowed. The Commonwealth also proved by Jacob Mosby, that the cap, now exhibited in Court, with the letters J. H. engraved upon it, was handed to him, sometime after the death of the said Elbert Mosby, and within one month from that time at his own house, a mile and a half, or two miles from the place where the said Elbert was killed, by a negro belonging to the estate of the witness's mother, but how the negro became possessed of it, he does not know.

This cap being applied to the handle
712 *of the dirk in Court, apparently fits the same. The Commonwealth also proved by Hugh French, that some sixteen or seventeen years ago, he purchased for James Hickman, a half brother of the prisoner, a dirk, on the handle of which were engraved the letters J. H., but he has not seen the dirk since he handed it to the said James Hickman, soon after the purchase, and cannot now say that the dirk now exhibited in Court, is the dirk he so purchased: does not remember what kind of handle the dirk had which he purchased, nor does he know that the prisoner ever was possessed of the dirk so purchased by him for James Hickman, or the dirk now produced in Court. The witness also proved, that the said James Hickman died unmarried and without children, but whether testate or intestate, he knows not. The Commonwealth further proved by Robert Mosby, that he once saw, in the possession of the prisoner, a dirk, which, as well as the witness remembers, the prisoner told him was the only property he ever received that belonged to his brother, James Hickman. The witness does not remember whether the dirk he saw in the prisoner's possession had a metal, or ivory handle; and although he remembers the letters J. H. were engraved on the handle, he does not remember whether they were made in the form of the letters on the cap of the dirk now produced in Court, or not. There was no evidence produced before the Court, which tended to prove that the prisoner had ever been at the place, or near the place, where the said dirk was found, other than that herein-before stated. Which facts and evidence the Counsel for the prisoner moved the Court to exclude from the Jury, as illegal evidence, and not tending to prove the use of the said dirk in the killing of the said Elbert Mosby; but, the Court over-ruled the motion of the prisoner's Counsel, and permitted the said evidence to go to the Jury, for them to decide, whether the dirk, so found, be the property of the prisoner; and if they find to a certainty, that the said dirk is the 713 property of the prisoner, *then the fact, that the prisoner's dirk was so found, is to be considered by them as a circumstance to be weighed with the other facts and circumstances given in evidence; but, the Jury will observe, that when guilt is attempted to be proved by circumstantial evidence, there ought to be no doubt of the facts used as circumstances. To the opinion of the Court the prisoner excepted.

The third Bill of Exception states, that the Commonwealth introduced Mozes Cardozo to prove that some three or four months before the death of Elbert Mosby, he borrowed a horseman's pistol of Thomas Scott, jr., to lend, and did lend the same to the prisoner, who said he was going to the Western Country: that the said pistol had never been returned by the prisoner to the said Cardozo. The Commonwealth also introduced the said Thomas Scott, jr., as a witness, who proved that he did lend a horseman's pistol to the said Cardozo, which had never been returned to him by the said Cardozo, or the prisoner. No evidence having been offered in this Court of the prisoner's confession, the Counsel for the prisoner offered to prove by the said Thomas Scott, jr., what disposition the prisoner had stated to the said Scott and Doctor Hening, since the death of Elbert Mosby, he had made of the said pistol, the Commonwealth having introduced the said Hening before the Examining Court, to prove, and by him did prove, the confession of the prisoner as to the disposition which he, the prisoner, had made of the said horseman's pistol; but the Court refused to allow the prisoner to avail himself of the benefit of his confession proved by the Commonwealth, and attempted to be used against the prisoner before the Examining Court. To which refusal the prisoner excepted.

The fourth Bill of Exceptions states, that on the trial of the cause, the Commonwealth introduced evidence to prove that a knife exhibited in Court, was picked up on the ground, not far from where the dead body of Elbert Mosby was found, on the morning of the second day after 714 *he was killed. The Commonwealth also introduced Allen Jenkins to prove, that the said knife was lent by him to the prisoner, on the second day of October Cumberland Court, 1827, in the orchard on Hezekiah Ford, about one mile from Cumberland Court-house, the said Jenkins admitting in his evidence given on this trial, that he had been examined before the committing Justice, and Examining Court in this case, not less than three times, and that he had in each examination before the present, sworn that he lent the knife, which he verily believes to be the one exhibited in Court, on the second day of Cumberland September Court, 1827: the prisoner then offered evidence to prove that evidence was introduced by the Commonwealth on two several occasions before the Examining Courts in this case, to sustain the evidence given by the said Allen Jenkins, in his first three examinations in this case, to wit: the evidence of one William Maxcy, who proved before the said Examining Courts, that he saw the prisoner in possession of the said identical knife, now produced in Court, some time in the latter part of August, or the early part of September, in the year 1827, as far as the said Maxcy could swear to the identity of a knife from its general appearance. The said Maxcy not having been summoned by the Commonwealth, or the prisoner, to this Court, the Court excluded from the Jury any evidence of what the said Maxcy had sworn to, in relation to the identity of said knife, and the time at which he saw it in the possession of the said prisoner, as illegal evidence to show, or tending to show, the means resorted to, to sustain this prosecution, or for any other purpose, the said Maxcy being now living, and residing in the county of Powhatan. To this opinion of the court, the prisoner excepted.

The court commenced this case on Saturday the 8th of November, and on Monday the 10th, the panel of the Jury was completed; the trial continued on the 11th, 12th, 13th and 14th November. On the last mentioned day, the Jury retired to consult 715 of their verdict, and after some time returned, and found the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree. The transcript of the Record furnishes this memorandum. "It was after midnight when the Jury rendered their verdict in this case."

On Saturday the 15th November, the Court again met, and passed sentence of death on the prisoner. The hour of the day on which this sentence was passed, is not noted on the Record.

The prisoner applied to the General Court for a Writ of Error to the Judgment, assigning as errors: 1st. The refusal to continue the cause; 2d. The refusal to reject Chalkley, as an unfit Juror; then the opinions which are set forth in the four Bills of Exceptions filed during the trial; and 7th. "Because the verdict of the Jury, and Judgment of the Court thereupon, were rendered and pronounced against your petitioner, after the Term of the said Superior Court had been legally ended, and when the Jury had no lawful authority to render such verdict, and the said Superior Court no lawful authority to pronounce such Judgment, to wit, on the 15th November, 1828, the first day of the present Term of this (General) Court. See 1 Rev. Co. p. 219, sect. 1, and p. 229, sect. 3."

S. Taylor for petitioner, and the Attorney General for the Commonwealth, submitted the case.

BOULDIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

After stating the case, he proceeded:

Every error assigned has been carefully examined by the Court, as also the point which arose on the prisoner's motion to quash the Indictment. But except the first and seventh of the errors assigned the Court see nothing whereon to raise a doubt.

Whether the Superior Court of Chesterfield ought to have continued the cause, will now be considered. On examining the Record, we find that the Record of 716 the Examining Court is made a part of it. On inspection, it appears at once that the prisoner meant not to be tried as long as he could get continuances.

The list of witnesses to whose materiality he swears on several occasions, is numerous, and yet on the final examination, when those to whose materiality he had sworn at the former Courts, do not appear to have been absent, not one of them was called on by him to give evidence in his behalf. This shows distinctly that the continuances moved for in that Court were not that he might have the benefit of the evidence of witnesses on his examination. At the first Term of the Superior Court of Chesterfield, he moved for a continuance, and it was granted to him, but he was informed by the Court, that on repeating that motion at a subsequent Term, he must prove the materiality of the absent witness, by producing the affidavit of the witness, if it could be procured. The circumstances of the case called for this caution. The evidence expected from the witness was short and simple; her affidavit might easily have been taken. If it had been taken, the prosecutor might have admitted it to go to the Jury. If the circumstances in any case can warrant such a conclusion, they will in this, that the affidavit was kept back either because the witness would not swear to what was expected, or that the prisoner preferred the chance for a continuance to the use of the evidence.

A reason which appears to have had influence with the Judge below is not without weight. There were more than thirty witnesses present on the part of the prisoner. For aught that appears, each of them might be able to give evidence having some remote bearing on the evidence given against him. No precise rule can be laid down as to the influence this circumstance ought to have in any case upon a motion for a continuance, but it is easy to see that such a number of witnesses lays the ground work for motions of this sort to be endless, and calls on the Court for circumspection in granting them. Upon all the circumstances here developed, the Court is unanimously of opinion, 717 *that the prisoner's motion for a continuance was properly over-ruled.

The question arising from the seventh error assigned, is whether the November Term of the Superior Court of Chesterfield was at an end when the verdict was rendered, and the Judgment given in the case. This depends on the true construction of the third section of the Circuit Court Law, 1 Rev. Co. p. 229, taken in connection with other sections of the same Act, and the General Court Law. The first section, p. 226, enacts, "that one Judge of the General Court shall hold a Court in each year at the Court-house, &c., at the times, and in the manner hereinafter directed." The second section arranges all the Counties into Circuits, and appoints the day of holding the Courts for each; thus, "a Court shall be holden in—Chesterfield on the second day of June, and the second day of November." Then comes the third section. "Each of the aforesaid Courts shall sit until the business thereof shall be dispatched, unless the Judge holding the same be compelled to leave the Court, in order to arrive in time at the next succeeding Court of his Circuit, or at the General Court." The eighth section of the same Law, p. 230, declares that, "if the Judge shall not attend on the first day of any Circuit Court, such Court shall stand adjourned from day to day, until a Court shall be made, if that shall happen before four of the clock in the afternoon of the third day." The General Court Law, p. 219, sect. 1, enacts, that "the General Court shall consist of (fifteen) Judges, &c. a majority of the whole number of the said Judges shall be necessary to constitute a General Court for the transaction of business in Term time, except as herein is excepted. The said Court shall be holden at the Capitol in the City of Richmond. The said Court shall be holden twice in every year, namely, on the fifteenth day of June, and fifteenth day of November. If a sufficient number of Judges should not attend on the first day of any Term, any one of the said Judges may adjourn the Court from day to day, for six days successively."

718 "In the language of the third section, there is certainly no express limitation of the Term: each Court is to sit until the business is dispatched, and two of the Judges (Brockenbrough and Summers,) are strongly inclined to think that the qualifying words, "unless the Judge be compelled, &c." are to be considered as directory, or permissive only, and that of the necessity to go to the next Court, or to finish what is before him, and what has been already begun, he is to judge, and on his own responsibility to decide whether a compliance with the express order of the Legislature, to dispatch the business before him, or to go to the next Court as the Law permits, will best subserve the public interest. And they argue that it is right it should be so, or else there would often be a failure of justice. In some of our Courts, it sometimes happens that cases of the most important character could not be finished, and consequently would never be tried, unless the Judge have the power to run into the Terms of the next Court to which his duty calls him, and as the Legislature fixed no precise limit, the construction which best fulfils their general purpose is the right one. They argue that the state of things at the first organization of the Circuit Court System, shows that theirs is the true rule. At that time the General Court was held on the 9th of June, and November. Many of the Superior Courts were held late in May, and October. In the distant Courts, situated more than three hundred miles from Richmond, the Judge must close his last Superior Court at least as early as the last day of the preceding month, to arrive here on the first day of the session of this Court. But that day finds him closely engaged in a difficult and important cause, which cannot yet be finished for a week. Had he no discretion to finish that cause because the Law required him to attend at Richmond on the 9th? Was every thing that he did there void, and coram non iudice, because of that injunction of the Law? They cannot think so.

But, whether that opinion be right or not, and they do not deem it necessary to press it) those Judges concur with 719 "five other Judges now present, in the opinion, that no limitation of the Term of the Court, which can be implied from the words of the third section, makes the Judgment now under consideration, void or erroneous.

If the Judge of the Superior Court of Chesterfield, after closing that Court on the 15th instant, did arrive, or could arrive at this Capitol at any time on the same day, he would have been "in time" to hold, in concurrence with seven others, if so many attended, a General Court on that day, or to adjourn the General Court to the next day, if he only attended: the verdict in this case was rendered in the night of the 14th, although after midnight, and for aught that appears, the Judgment was rendered early the next morning. It is judicially known of this Court that Chesterfield Court-house is not very remote from this Capitol, and that three hours moderate riding would bring the Judge here. If, when that Judgment was rendered, there was not time for the Judge to arrive at the General Court on the 15th, that matter ought to have been shown by exception. Some of the Judges of this Court are in the habit of finishing the business of one Superior Court, in the morning of the first day of the next succeeding Superior Court, and sometimes of doing a good day's business in the latter Court on the same day.

Suppose the Act of Assembly to be construed as if in place of the words "unless," &c. it had been thus written: "but so soon as it becomes necessary for the Judge to leave the Court, in order to arrive in time at his next Court, his power to hold the former Court shall cease." If such had been the language, the Judgment under consideration would still have been good. It appears from this Record, that the Judge rendered the Judgment on the 15th, and it cannot be intended, as it does not so appear, that he did not leave himself time to arrive here on the same day.

It has been argued, that the Act appointing particular and several days whereon the same Judge shall hold several 720 "Courts, excludes the idea that he may on the day he is directed to hold a Court in one County, be holding it in another. It is true that the first and second sections do declare that Courts shall be held in one County on a particular day, and in another county on another day, and those sections say nothing about the duration of the Term. If the Act had stopped there, it may be doubted whether in strictness the Courts could be held for a longer period than the day so appointed, or whether any adjournment could take place, even to the next day; but then the third section comes in, and does not leave this matter to conjecture, or construction. It in effect, directs that adjournments shall take place, from day to day, until the business is done, "unless the Judge holding the same be compelled to leave the Court in order to arrive in time at the next succeeding Court, or at the General Court." To construe this permissive language as if it had been, "provided the business can be dispatched before the day on which the next Court is to be holden," would be to depart from the latter, not to further, but to defeat, the general objects of the Legislature. That general object is, that the business of both Courts may be done. The natural sense of the language used, does not allow the Judge to leave the business of the Court he is holding unfinished, so long as he can transact the same, and have time to open the next Court on the day appointed by Law.

A majority of the Court do not see any valid objection to taking the time the Law allows the next Circuit Court to stand adjourned to, without the attendance of the Judge, into the account. Thus, according to the eighth section, if the Judge does not attend, the Court stands adjourned from day to day, till four o'clock of the third day. If a trial of a cause in the preceding Superior Court, is greatly protracted, the necessity of the case would justify the Judge, in our opinion, in not closing that Court till the period arrives when he might be compelled to leave the Court in order to arrive at the next Superior Court 721 by four o'clock of the third day.

But it is not necessary to decide that question now, particularly as one of the majority (Saunders, J.) is not entirely satisfied on that point. The Record before us does not show but that the Judge might have so closed his business in Chesterfield, as to have literally complied with his duty to be here in time, on the first day of this Court. The course taken is a literal adherence to the Legislative direction to dispatch the business of the Superior Court of Chesterfield, so long as he could do so, and arrive in time at the General Court.

On this seventh error assigned by the prisoner's Counsel, three of the Court, (Parker, Upshur, and Field, J.) are of opinion, that a Writ of Error should be awarded, but all the other Judges present, being seven in number, are against it.

On all the other points exhibited by the Record, all the Judges are of opinion that there is no error, and the Writ of Error is therefore refused.

I. DEFINITION.

Who Are Experts.—All persons who practice a business or profession which requires them to possess a certain knowledge of the matter in hand, are experts, so far as expertness is required. Bird v. Com., 21 Gratt. 800. and note: Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Tanner, 100 Va. 379, 41 S. E. Rep. 721. But see McKelvey v. C. & O. R. Co., 85 W. Va. 500, 14 S. E. Rep. 261; Overby v. C. & O. R. Co., 37 W. Va. 524, 16 S. E. Rep. 813.

II. GENERAL RULE AS TO ADMISSIBILITY.

1. OPINION RULE.—No principle of law is better settled than that the opinions of witnesses are, in general, inadmissible, and that witnesses can testify to facts only, and not to opinions or conclusions based upon the facts, for to allow the witness to draw conclusions or inferences from testimony, would be to allow him to usurp the province of the jury which is so jealously guarded by all courts of this country. Southern Ry. Co. v. Mauzy, 98 Va. 662, 37 S. E. Rep. 285; Hanriot v. Sherwood, 82 Va. 1; Taylor v. R. Co., 33 W. Va. 39, 10 S. E. Rep. 29; State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. Rep. 813; State v. Welch, 36 W. Va. 690, 15 S. E. Rep. 419; Sulphur Mines Co. v. Thompson, 93 Va. 293, 25 S. E. Rep. 232; House v. House (Va.), 46 S. E. Rep. 290.

Necessity of Receiving Opinions.—Undoubtedly, however, there are questions upon which non-experts may give their opinions, as, for example, questions of identity, velocity, distances and the like, because such questions usually depend upon a variety of circumstances which are incapable of being presented with their proper force and significance to any but the observer. Tyler v. Sites, 90 Va. 539, 19 S. E. Rep. 174; State v. Welch, 36 W. Va. 690, 15 S. E. Rep. 419; Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Tanner, 100 Va. 379, 41 S. E. Rep. 721. See infra, this note: "Subjects of Nonexpert Opinion." VII. 3.

Test of Admissibility.—But the opinions of witnesses are never to be received if all the facts can be ascertained and made intelligible to the jury, or if it is such as men in general are capable of comprehending and understanding. State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. Rep. 813; Tyler v. Sites, 90 Va. 539, 19 S. E. Rep. 174; Guarantee Co. v. Bank, 95 Va. 480, 28 S. E. Rep. 909.

Moreover, the opinion of a witness, who neither knows nor can know more about the subject matter than the jury, and who must draw his deductions from facts already in the possession of the jury, is not admissible. Overby v. C. & O. R. Co., 37 W. Va. 524, 16 S. E. Rep. 813.

2. EXPERT-EVIDENCE RULE.—The general rule is that the opinions of experts or skilled witnesses are admissible in evidence in those cases in which the matter of inquiry is such that inexperienced persons are unlikely to prove capable of forming a correct judgment upon it, for the reason that the subject matter so far partakes of the nature of a science, art or trade as to require a previous habit of experience or study in it to acquire a knowledge thereof. State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. Rep. 813.

Test of Admissibility.—Where the inquiry, however, relates to a subject which does not require peculiar habits of study in order to enable a man to understand it, the opinion of skilled or scientific witnesses is not admissible. Overby v. C. & O. R. Co., 37 W. Va. 524, 16 S. E. Rep. 813; Welch v. Insurance Co., 28 W. Va. 806; State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. Rep. 813; State v. Hull, 45 W. Va. 767, 22 S. E. Rep. 241. "The competency of expert testimony in a particular case depends upon the question as to whether or not any peculiar knowledge, science, skill or art, not possessed by ordinary persons, is necessary to the determination of the matter at issue: * * * that expert testimony is not admissible as to matters within the experience or knowledge of persons of ordinary information, as to which the jury are competent to draw their own inferences from the facts given in evidence before them, without extraneous aid other than the instructions of the court upon questions of law." Hammond v. Woodman, 41 Me. 177, 66 Am. Dec. 219, 228. The above language was approved in Southern Ry. Co. v. Manzy, 98 Va. 692, 37 S. E. Rep. 285.

Hence, if the facts can be placed before a jury, and they are of such a nature that jurors generally are just as competent to form an opinion in reference to them and draw inferences from them as witnesses, then the opinions of experts cannot be received in evidence. Overby v. C. & O. R. Co., 37 W. Va. 524, 16 S. E. Rep. 813.

Negligence.—Where the facts from which negligence is to be inferred are within the range of ordinary human experience, the opinions of the men on the jury, in the eye of the law, is better than those of experts; but, where the injury involves questions of science or skill, expert evidence is admissible. Parlett v. Dunn (Va.), 46 S. E. Rep. 467.

Method of Putting Up Hoisting Apparatus.—In an action by an employee to recover damages from his employer for personal injuries resulting from the negligence of the latter in failing to provide for the plaintiff a reasonably safe place in which to work and reasonably safe and suitable appliances or machinery with which to work, it was held that expert evidence was admissible to show the usual method of putting up a hoisting apparatus, because the manner in which such an appliance should be constructed, placed in position, and fastened so as to make it reasonably safe and suitable for the work to be done is not within the range of the experience of men unskilled in the use of such an appliance. Parlett v. Dunn (Va.), 46 S. E. Rep. 467.

Speed—Space in Which Car May Be Stopped.—Expert evidence is admissible to determine within what space a car running under certain conditions may be stopped. Norfolk Ry. & Light Co. v. Corletto, 100 Va. 856, 41 S. E. Rep. 740.

But the speed of a passing train is not a question of science, but of observation, and anyone possessing knowledge of time and distance is competent to testify in relation thereto. McVey v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 46 W. Va. 111, 33 S. E. Rep. 1012.

Purpose of Expert Testimony.—The object of all questions to experts should be to obtain their opinion as to matters of skill or science which are in controversy, and at the same time, to exclude their opinions as to the effect of the evidence in establishing controverted facts. State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. Rep. 813.

Province of Jury.—While the admission of the opinions of experts necessarily gives rise to very nice distinctions between facts and findings, it nevertheless does not annul the rule of law axiomatic with reference to them, as well as to all witnesses, that they must not be so examined as to substitute their opinions for the verdict, and thus completely usurp the peculiar province of the jury. State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. Rep. 813; State v. Hull, 45 W. Va. 767, 32 S. E. Rep. 241.

3. WEIGHT OF EXPERT TESTIMONY.—The testimony of experts is not entitled to any greater weight as a matter of law than that of other witnesses unless it appears that the expert has had better means and opportunities of knowing whereof he speaks than the nonprofessional witness, otherwise it is to receive only such weight and credit as the jury deem it entitled to when viewed in connection with all the circumstances. Ward v. Brown, 53 W. Va. 227, 44 S. E. Rep. 488, citing and explaining many Virginia and West Virginia cases.

Testimony of Physician on Mental Capacity.—In accordance with this rule it was held to be error to instruct the jury that the evidence of physicians testifying as experts only, on questions of mental capacity, is entitled to great weight. Ward v. Brown, 53 W. Va. 227, 44 S. E. Rep. 488.

III. QUALIFICATION OF EXPERTS.

Source of Knowledge.—Expert knowledge may be derived from the study of a profession or from mental application, as in the case of a surgeon who derives his knowledge from the study necessarily incident to acquiring a knowledge of his profession. Mendum v. Com., 6 Rand. 704.

Degree of Expertness Required.—The rule seems to be that an expert need not have all the knowledge possible for one in his class to entitle him to speak, but may testify unless it clearly appears that he was not qualified at all. Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 637, 27 S. E. Rep. 509.

Proof of Expertness.—When the opinion of an expert is offered in evidence, and it is objected to, because he is not an expert, the court may hear evidence to ascertain whether he is so or not, and on being satisfied that he is an expert, may allow his opinion to be given in evidence. Mendum v. Com., 6 Rand. 704.

But the mere expression of belief by a party that he is an expert is not sufficient to constitute him such; he must further testify as to some information, skill or experience in a certain line, to bring him within that class. Com. v. Larkin, 88 Va. 423, 13 S. E. Rep. 901.

Discretion of Trial Court.—The question of the qualifications of a witness to testify as an expert is largely in the discretion of the trial court, and although it is not altogether clear that the witness had sufficient knowledge upon the subject to be considered an expert, still the action of the trial court will not be reversed for admitting such testimony unless it clearly appears that he was not qualified. Richmond, etc., Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 637, 27 S. E. Rep. 509.

IV. EXPERT AND NONEXPERT CONTRASTED.

The nonexpert testifies as to conclusions which may be verified by the court or jury; the expert as to conclusions that cannot be; the nonexpert gives the result of a process of reasoning familiar to every day life; the expert gives the results of a process which can be mastered only by special scientists. McKelvey v. C. & O. R. Co., 35 W. Va. 500, 14 S. E. Rep. 261.

V. KINDS OF EXPERTS.

Priests.—A priest familiar with the marriage laws and usages of a foreign jurisdiction may be permitted to prove them by his own evidence. Bird v. Com., 21 Gratt. 800.

Physicians and Surgeons.—Likewise, when it is proven that a witness is a practicing physician, he is competent to express an opinion, as an expert, upon a medical question. Livingston v. Com., 14 Gratt. 592; Barker v. Ohio River R. Co., 51 W. Va. 423, 41 S. E. Rep. 148.

Cause of Death—Effect of Wounds.—Upon a trial, for homicide, the commonwealth may introduce as witnesses physicians and surgeons to give their opinion upon a state of facts testified to by themselves or other witnesses, in respect to a wound or beating proved to have been inflicted on the deceased, as to whether such wound or beating would be a cause adequate to produce death, or was the actual cause of death; but the questions put and the answers given should be so put or given as not to elicit or express an opinion by the physician on the credit of the witnesses or the truth of the facts testified to by others. Livingston v. Com., 14 Gratt. 562.

Effect of Drugs.—Whether criminal charges preferred by a female patient against a physician are the result of an hallucination, while under the influence of chloroform and ether, is a question that must be determined by expert medical evidence, as it is not a matter of ordinary human experience or knowledge. State v. Perry, 41 W. Va. 641, 24 S. E. Rep. 634.

Instrument of Infliction.—A surgeon is competent to state, from his general knowledge of the human body, and of the practice and principles of surgery, that he had no doubt of his ability to form a correct opinion as to the difference between a dirk and a knife wound. Mendum v. Com., 6 Rand. 704.

Life Insurance—Examining Physician—Insurance Expert.—It was held in Schwarzbach v. Protective Union, 35 W. Va. 623, that a question asked of the examining physician and of a man engaged in the insurance business as experts, as to what would be the character of the risk of a man's life, if within three months he had a hemorrhage of the stomach, was properly not allowed to be put or answered.

Rape.—Likewise, a medical witness, who is examined as an expert in the trial of an indictment for rape, after stating that he had been called upon to examine the prosecutrix, will not be allowed to express the opinion to the jury that no girl would have voluntarily submitted to the suffering necessary to have brought about this result, because the jury is just as capable of arriving at this conclusion as the physician. State v. Hull, 45 W. Va. 767, 32 S. E. Rep. 241.

Whether a person with a wooden leg is incapacitated from kneeling, or thereby rendered incapable of committing an offense in the manner charged, is a subject matter of inquiry, justifying the introduction of expert medical testimony, to assist the jury in arriving at a correct conclusion. State v. Perry, 41 W. Va. 641, 24 S. E. Rep. 634, 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (3d Ed.) on Expert and Opinion Evidence, and note 15 on p. 453.

Hypothetical Question.—Where the conclusions called for by an hypothetical question from a medical man, who is being examined as an expert, depend upon facts, the evidential weight of which can only be determined by those familiar with that specialty, then those conclusions may be given by an expert in such specialty. Bowen v. City of Huntington, 35 W. Va. 662, 14 S. E. Rep. 317. But see Guarantee Co. v. Bank, 35 Va. 480, 28 S. E. Rep. 900.

Insanity—Value of Testimony.—The opinion of a witness, as to the sanity of a person, depends, for its weight, on the capacity of the witness to judge, and his opportunity. Physicians are considered as occupying a high grade on such questions, both because they are generally men of cultivated minds and observation, and because, from the course of their education and pursuits, they are supposed to have turned their attention more particularly to such subjects, and therefore, to be able to discriminate more accurately; especially a physician who has attended the patient through the disease, which is supposed to have disabled his mind. Burton v. Scott, 3 Rand. 399, 403; Opinion of Carr, J.; Cheatham v. Hatcher, 30 Gratt. 65; Montague v. Allan, 78 Va. 592. Compare Ward v. Brown (Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 468.

Example.—For example where the defence, in a trial for murder, is insanity, it is competent to ask a medical expert such a question as this: "Suppose a man had inherited a predisposition to insanity, would great mental anxiety, loss of property, or the honor of one's family, and losses of other kinds be likely to develop the disease?" Dejarnette's Case, 75 Va. 867.

Proximate Cause.—Where a party, suffering from paralysis, institutes an action for damages against a city, claiming that the disease is the result of injuries inflicted by the negligence of the city, and the city wishes to defend on the ground that it is the result of a disease of long standing, it is competent for a medical witness, in response to an hypothetical question, to state his conclusions as to the proximate cause of the paralysis. Bowen v. City of Huntington, 35 W. Va. 662, 14 S. E. Rep. 317.

Surveyors.—The opinion of a surveyor as to the location of a certain tract of land, where he does not mention a single fact to enable the court to determine the location of the land in question, but merely says that he is satisfied as to its identity, is clearly insufficient to locate the land in question, because it amounts to nothing more than the opinion of a witness. Moreover, the purpose of evidence is to satisfy the court and not the witness. Randolph v. Adams, 2 W. Va. 519.

Notaries.—The evidence of a notary, taking the acknowledgment of a deed, who is also a competent physician and expert as to mental diseases, that the grantor was competent to execute it, is entitled to very great weight. Farnsworth v. Noffsinger, 45 W. Va. 410, 33 S. E. Rep. 246. See also, Delaplain v. Grubb, 44 W. Va. 612, 30 S. E. Rep. 201.

Merchants.—It was held in James v. Adams, 15 W. Va. 245, that the opinions of dry goods merchants are admissible to prove the market value of a remnant of dry goods, at the time the party agreed to accept it, although they are not acquainted with the particular stock of goods, but who testify to the per cent. they have depreciated, on the ground that they consist of the less saleable portion of the goods, and because they are injured by being kept a considerable time in a store.

Engineers.—But a locomotive engineer, who has no knowledge derived from study or experience, in the construction or repair of locomotives, is not an expert, and his opinion is not admissible. McKelvey v. C. & O. R. Co., 35 W. Va. 500, 14 S. E. Rep. 361. But see Norfolk & W. Ry. Co. v. Tanner, 100 Va. 379, 41 S. E. Rep. 721.

Farmers.—Although a person has, all his life, been familiar with the effect of a dam upon the channel of a stream, and has twice superintended the putting up of the dam, and is also familiar with the effect upon the channel of the stream when the dam is washed away, but who is not a millwright or mechanic of any sort, but only a farmer and owner of the mill, still he is not competent to give evidence as an expert, as to the effect of a dam upon a stream in another county thirty miles away. Ellis v. Harris, 32 Gratt. 664.

VI. SUBJECTS OF EXPERT TESTIMONY.

1. GENERAL RULE.—When the question involved does not lie within the range of common experience or common knowledge, but requires special experience or special knowledge, then the opinions of witnesses skilled in the particular science, art or trade, to which the question relates, are admissible in evidence. State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 673, 23 S. E. Rep. 813; Overby v. C. & O. R. Co., 37 W. Va. 594, 16 S. E. Rep. 813; Welch v. Ins. Co., 23 W. Va. 306.

2. OPINIONS BASED ON EVIDENCE OF OTHERS.

a. Hypothetical Questions.—When a medical witness is introduced and examined as an expert it is proper to propound to him an hypothetical question, reciting certain facts which the evidence in the cause tends to prove, and such recital need not contain all the facts which the evidence has a tendency to prove, but counsel may embody in the question such facts as tend to support his theory of the case in order to elicit the opinion of the witness based upon the testimony of other witnesses in the cause, or upon scientific principles applied to the facts so testified to. Bowen v. City of Huntington, 36 W. Va. 682, 14 S. E. Rep. 217.

But where the facts and circumstances shown in evidence are such that men in general are capable of comprehending them, forming an intelligent opinion about them, and drawing their own conclusions therefrom, then the opinion of an expert, founded upon an hypothetical state of facts, is inadmissible. Guarantee Co. v. Bank, 95 Va. 490, 28 S. E. Rep. 909.

Question Put How.—On a direct examination the questions put to an expert must be framed hypothetically, unless there is no conflict of evidence as to the facts, or unless the expert is personally acquainted with them. State v. Maier, 36 W. Va. 757, 15 S. E. Rep. 991.

Presence of Witness at Trial.—In order to obtain the opinion of a witness on matters not depending upon general knowledge, but on facts, not testified to by himself, either the witness must be present and hear all of the testimony, or the testimony must be summed up in the question put to him, and in either case the question is put to him hypothetically. Sebrell v. Barrows, 36 W. Va. 212, 14 S. E. Rep. 996.

Conflict in Evidence.—Although an expert may have heard all the testimony in the case, he cannot be asked to give his opinion, based merely upon his having heard such testimony, whenever there is a conflict therein, unless the same is hypothetically propounded to him. State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. Rep. 813. See also, State v. Maier, 36 W. Va. 757, 15 S. E. Rep. 991.

Doubtful Facts.—An expert cannot be asked to give his opinion upon doubtful facts in the case on trial, which remain to be found by the jury, but a similar case may be hypothetically put to him, based upon the evidence in such case. State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 672, 28 S. E. Rep. 813.

Hypothesis Must Be Clearly Stated.—The opinion of medical experts, founded on testimony already in the case, can only be given on a hypothetical case; and the hypothesis must be clearly stated, so that the jury may know with certainty upon precisely what state of assumed facts the expert bases his opinion. Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 8 S. E. Rep. 493; McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 683.

Assumption of Facts.—In putting hypothetical questions to expert witnesses, counsel may assume the facts in accordance with their theory of them; it is not essential that he state the facts as they exist, but the hypothesis must be based on a state of facts which the evidence in the cause tends to prove. Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 8 S. E. Rep. 493.

Opinion on Credibility of Witnesses.—Upon a trial in which expert medical testimony is competent and proper, the physician or expert may give his opinion on any hypothetical state of facts which the evidence tends to prove, but his opinion must be based upon the state of facts as testified to by himself or other witnesses, but not upon his knowledge of other facts not testified to by himself or others. In such case, the questions put and the answers given should be so put and so given as not to elicit or express an opinion by the physician or other expert on the credit of the witnesses, or the truth of the facts testified to. Bowen v. City of Huntington, 36 W. Va. 682, 14 S. E. Rep. 217; Living- ston v. Com., 14 Gratt. 592; Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 8 S. E. Rep. 493; McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 683.

3. CLASSIFICATION OF SUBJECTS.

Hogs.—An experienced drover of hogs, accustomed to butchering and weighing them, who was present when the hogs were weighed, and saw them and attended to the weighing of them, may give to the jury his opinion as to the weight of each hog. McCormick v. Hamilton, 23 Gratt. 561, and note.

Damages.—"There is no objection to taking the opinion of witnesses as to either the amount of damages or as to the amount of the benefit. It is the usual practice in this state and Virginia." Per GREEN, J. Railroad Co. v. Foreman, 24 W. Va. 663.

Burning of Wool.—The opinion of witnesses as to whether a quantity of wool burned could have been completely destroyed in the burning of a building of a certain size, is not admissible, for this is not a question which requires expert testimony to understand. Welch v. Ins. Co., 23 W. Va. 288.

Opinion as to Value Both before and after Injury.—Opinions of witnesses as to the value of property before and after a change in a street's grade, are admissible as evidence in actions against municipal corporations for damages flowing from such change. Blair v. City of Charleston, 43 W. Va. 63, 28 S. E. Rep. 346.

Present Damages.—In an action for damages for diverting water a witness may state from facts within his knowledge, what, in his opinion, was the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff because of such diversion of the water; and to authorize the giving of such opinion it is not necessary that the party be an expert. Hargreaves v. Kimberly, 26 W. Va. 787.

Future Damages.—But a witness in an action for damages for diverting water, cannot state, from facts within his knowledge, what in his opinion will be the future damages to the plaintiff from the act of the defendant. Hargreaves v. Kimberly, 26 W. Va. 787; Rogers v. Coal River Boom & Driving Co., 39 W. Va. 272, 19 S. E. Rep. 401.

Proof of Damages.—It was held in Lawson v. Conway, 37 W. Va. 159, 16 S. E. Rep. 564, in an action against a physician for malpractice, that the testimony of a witness that he was "well acquainted with the physical ability of the plaintiff to perform manual labor, both before and since the breaking of his arm, that he was an able-bodied man before the injury, and that since the injury he could perform no more than one-half a man's work, and that the witness and plaintiff were both farmers, and lived near together," is competent, and ought not to have been excluded.

Probability of Damage.—In an action by a riparian owner to recover damages for the overflowing of the plaintiff's land, alleged to have been caused by an insufficient water way under the defendant's bridge, the opinion of the plaintiff, as to whether any damage would have been done, if certain alterations had not been made in the bridge, is incompetent. Taylor v. B. & O. R. Co., 33 W. Va. 39, 10 S. E. Rep. 29.

Management of Craft.—Where a witness is called and examined as an expert as to whether a steamboat was properly landed for the purpose of discharging a passenger, as to what officers were required to properly man such a boat, it must not only appear that the witness has such knowledge and experience in reference to the subject matter under consideration, but that he is acquainted with the class and dimensions of the boat, and the character and condition of the river and the shore where the landing was made, or has heard the same described by witnesses in a case, before he can be allowed to express his opinion as an expert. Sebrell v. Barrows, 36 W. Va. 212, 14 S. E. Rep. 994.

Divorce—Danger of Bodily Harm to One Consort.—In a suit by a husband against his wife for divorce a mensa et thoro upon the ground that she had attempted to take his life and he had reasonable ground to fear serious bodily hurt, the opinion of witnesses, that from their knowledge of the character or reputation of the parties they did not believe that the husband could with safety cohabit with his wife, is inadmissible. House v. House, 102 Va. 235, 46 S. E. Rep. 299.

Railroading.

Moving Heavy Wheels.—A witness having sufficient knowledge may testify as to the general practice of machine shops in moving large wheels, and the comparative safety of different methods, but his testimony is not competent to show that the different methods of another shop are better than those of the defendant. Richmond, etc., Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. Rep. 509; Southern Ry. Co. v. Mauzy, 98 Va. 692, 37 S. E. Rep. 285.

Loading Cars.—But witnesses cannot express an opinion as to the best and safest mode of loading car wheels on a flat car, for expert testimony is not necessary to explain or elucidate such a matter, since the question of danger or safety in loading car wheels in a particular mode is one which any person of common intelligence and observation can as readily determine as a so-called expert. Southern Ry. Co. v. Mauzy, 98 Va. 692, 37 S. E. Rep. 285.

Bridges.—A witness may give his opinion as to whether certain stone and mud, at the foot of the abutments of a bridge, contracted the channel of the stream or not. Taylor v. B. & O. R. Co., 33 W. Va. 89, 10 S. E. Rep. 29.

Signal Posts—Hypothetical Facts.—But a question "If there had been any signal post, with signals and a watchman, as the contract requires, and as is now there, could there have been any accident on that occasion?" is inadmissible, on the ground that it calls for an expression of a mere opinion upon the part of a witness as to a conclusion upon an hypothetical state of facts. Norfolk & C. R. Co. v. Suffolk, etc., Co., 92 Va. 418, 23 S. E. Rep. 737.

Ordinary Care.—The question of what is "ordinary care" is one for the jury to pass upon under all the circumstances of the case, the age of the plaintiff being one of the facts considered, and cannot be shown by expert testimony. City of Roanoke v. Shull, 97 Va. 419, 34 S. E. Rep. 24.

Cancellation of Words.—The question whether certain words in a paper have been cancelled, is a question of fact, and the evidence of experts ought to be permitted to go to the jury upon such a matter, unless it is entirely clear on the face of the paper, that certain words have been stricken out and cancelled. Beach v. O'Riley, 14 W. Va. 55.

Thawing Dynamite before Open Fire.—The opinions of scientific experts are not necessary upon the question as to whether thawing dynamite before an open fire is safe or not. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 23 S. E. Rep. 869.

Price of Wheat.—It seems that the testimony of a witness is inadmissible to prove the price of wheat per bushel; by having the price of flour per barrel given him, without other proof that such person is an expert, because wheat and flour are articles of such universal acquaintance and use in this country, that the presumption is that every man (not proved to the contrary) is in some sort an expert in that matter, but this is probably the extreme limit of the rule. Hood v. Maxwell, 1 W. Va. 219.

Handwriting—Present Rule.—Expert testimony is admissible to test the genuineness of disputed writings by comparison of writings which are admitted to be genuine with writings which are alleged to be forged. Hanriot v. Sherwood, 82 Va. 1; Tower v. Ulup (Va.), 44 S. E. Rep. 179. See also, Ware v. Starkey, 80 Va. 204; Cody v. Conly, 27 Gratt. 313, and note. But see the opinion in Hanriot v. Sherwood, in which LACY, J., distinguishes and explains the former cases upon this subject.

It was held in Brown v. Hall, 85 Va. 146, 7 S. E. Rep. 182, that the refusal to allow a witness, acquainted with the handwriting of the propounder of an alleged holographic will, which was alleged to have been forged, to testify that the will is in the handwriting of the propounder, is error, though the witness did not know the testator's handwriting.

But it has been held that an expert, who has no personal knowledge of the handwriting of the person whose writing is in question, cannot give his belief as to its genuineness merely by comparison of two writings. Clay v. Robinson, 7 W. Va. 348.

Former Rule.—But the rule formerly was that a witness could not prove the genuineness of writings in question by comparison with other proved specimens, although he declares himself perfectly familiar with the person's handwriting, and the circumstances upon which he founds this belief. Rowt v. Kile, 1 Leigh 216; Burress v. Com., 27 Gratt. 984.

Competency of Evidence.—To render a person a competent witness to testify as to the handwriting of another, it is not sufficient to show the receipt of friendly letters purporting to come from such person alone, but some admission or acquiescence equivalent to an acknowledgment that she was the writer of such letters must be shown on the part of such person, independent of their receipt and contents. Flowers v. Fletcher, 40 W. Va. 103, 20 S. E. Rep. 870.

Refreshing Memory.—The evidence of a witness as to handwriting, who has formed an acquaintance with it, from seeing the party write, or from a course of correspondence, is not rendered incompetent, nor its weight impaired, by his having referred to papers in his own possession, known to be written by the party, to refresh his memory. Redford v. Peggy, 6 Rand. 316.

Statutory Rule.—It was held in Commonwealth v. Weller, 83 Va. 721, 1 S. E. Rep. 102, that the act of January 21, 1886, forbidding expert evidence to prove the genuineness of any instrument made by machinery, etc., is not repugnant to art. 1, § 10 of the U. S. Constitution, for this section has no application whatever to rules of evidence prescribed by the law-making power of the state to govern proceedings in her court. See also, Newton v. Com., 83 Va. 647; Com. v. Booker, 82 Va. 964, 7 S. E. Rep. 831; Va. Code, § 412.

4. TIME FOR ADMISSION.—Expert testimony should not be allowed after the parties have announced that they are through, or after the case has been submitted to the jury, except under very extraordinary circumstances, and for good cause. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 23 S. E. Rep. 869.

VII. NONEXPERT OPINION.

1. GENERAL RULE.—Though we have seen that opinion evidence, as a general rule, is not admissible, still when the facts are such, that it is manifestly impossible to present them to the jury with the same force and clearness as they appeared to the observer, then opinion is admissible as to the conclusions and inferences to be drawn therefrom. Tyler v. Sites, 90 Va. 542, 19 S. E. Rep. 174; Cropp v. Cropp, 88 Va. 753, 14 S. E. Rep. 529; State v. Welch, 36

W. Va. 690, 15 S. E. Rep. 419; State v. Musgrave, 43 W. Va. 673, 28 S. E. Rep. 818.

2. BASIS OF NONEXPERT OPINION.—On questions of insanity, a witness, who is not an expert, is allowed to express his opinion where he has personal knowledge of the facts on which his opinion is based. State v. Maier, 36 W. Va. 767, 15 S. E. Rep. 991.

3. SUBJECTS OF NONEXPERT OPINION.

Age.—It is inadmissible to ask a witness his opinion as to the age of another from his appearance. Valley Mutual Life Ass'n v. Teewalt, 79 Va. 431.

Appearance, Conduct and Demeanor.—A witness cannot give his opinion, in an action against a railroad for killing a person walking on its tracks, whether there was enough in the deceased's appearance to indicate to the engine man that he was bereft of his faculties, for this is a question for the jury to determine for themselves upon the facts of the case, and not upon the opinions of witnesses. To allow a witness to give his opinion as to another's mental condition is a very different thing from allowing him to say what, in his opinion, some one else ought to have thought. Tyler v. Sites, 90 Va. 539, 19 S. E. Rep. 174.

Identity of Person.—A witness who testifies that he knows the person in question may be asked his belief as to the identity of such person. It is not a case of "expert testimony," but depends upon the observation and knowledge of the particular witness in the given case, to go to the jury for what it is worth, no matter what his science, skill or experience may be in the matter of identifying a person. State v. Harr, 88 W. Va. 58, 17 S. E. Rep. 794. See also, Hopper's Case, 6 Gratt. 684.

Identity of Land.—Where witnesses admit that they cannot identify a tract of land from the entries or memoranda in the books of patents, deeds and other documentary evidence, they cannot give it as their opinion that it is included in the boundaries of the land in dispute, for this is not knowledge, nor is it the statement of a fact, but merely an opinion, and hence inadmissible. Holleran v. Meisel, 91 Va. 143, 21 S. E. Rep. 658.

Hypothetical Case—Probability of Accident.—A non-expert witness cannot express an opinion as to the probability of an accident under a different and hypothetical state of facts. Norfolk & C. R. Co. v. Lumber Co., 92 Va. 413, 23 S. E. Rep. 787. See infra, this note, "Opinions Based on Evidence of Others," VI, 2.

Depression in Bed.—A witness may give his opinion that a depression in a bed was, from its shape and appearance, caused by the head of a person; he having seen and examined it. State v. Welch, 36 W. Va. 690, 15 S. E. Rep. 419.

Bloodstains.—A witness may give his opinion that stains seen by him are bloodstains, and that a certain large stain seen by him upon bedclothing was the stain of a pool of blood. State v. Welch, 36 W. Va. 690, 15 S. E. Rep. 419. See also, State v. Baker, 33 W. Va. 319, 10 S. E. Rep. 639.

Insanity.—Where nonprofessional witnesses are conversant with the life of the person whose sanity is drawn in question, his disposition and habits, and have long been on terms of familiar intercourse with him, their testimony is regarded as being entitled to greater weight than that of scientific witnesses who have not had such opportunities of forming an opinion; nor does its value depend upon the number of the witnesses, but upon their intelligence, means of knowledge, and the reasons they give for their testimony. Cropp v. Cropp, 88 Va. 753, 14 S. E. Rep. 529.

Testamentary Capacity.—The opinions of witnesses, who have long been acquainted with a testator and have had peculiar advantages of knowing as to his capacity, are admissible in a suit to set aside a will; but except in the case of experts, their testimony is entitled to little weight unless founded on facts, because such evidence is a mere matter of opinion, and is generally conflicting. Whitelaw v. Sims, 90 Va. 588, 19 S. E. Rep. 113; Young v. Barner, 27 Gratt. 103.

Personal Injuries—Dangerous Locality.—And in an action for personal injuries, witnesses cannot be allowed to express their opinions as to whether the locality at which the injury was inflicted was dangerous or not. Childress v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 94 Va. 186, 26 S. E. Rep. 424; Whitelaw v. Sims, 90 Va. 588, 19 S. E. Rep. 113; Young v. Barner, 27 Gratt. 103, and note.

Appearance as Indicating Insanity.—Where witnesses are examined by the state in rebuttal on the question of insanity, who have had transactions with the prisoner, and have known him well for months and years, immediately preceding the killing, the prosecution may ask such witnesses whether or not they had ever observed anything about the prisoner, or in what he said or did that indicated insanity. State v. Maier, 36 W. Va. 767, 15 S. E. Rep. 991.

Value of Testimony.—The mere opinions of witnesses, not experts, as to sanity and competency to do a given act, are of little weight, unless based on facts which give good reason for such opinions; and, if the facts are frivolous or unimportant, the opinions of such witnesses, based upon them, are of little weight. Farnsworth v. Noffsinger, 46 W. Va. 410, 33 S. E. Rep. 246; Jarrett v. Jarrett, 11 W. Va. 584; Dower v. Church, 21 W. Va. 60; Kerr v. Lunsford, 31 W. Va. 659, 8 S. E. Rep. 493.

The evidence of nonprofessional witnesses, as to the sanity of a party, whom they have approached on business, is clearly admissible, and entitled to great weight, where they give the grounds upon which they base their opinions. Fishburne v. Ferguson, 84 Va. 87, 4 S. E. Rep. 575.

Whiteford v. The Commonwealth.

November, 1923.

Murder in First Degree—What Constitutes—Premeditated Design—How Long It Must Exist.—To constitute murder in the first degree, it is not necessary that the premeditated design to kill should have existed for any particular length of time. If, therefore, the accused, as he approached the deceased, and first came within view of him at a short distance, then formed the design to kill, and walked up with a quick pace, and killed him without any provocation then, or recently received, it is murder in the first degree.

Same—Same—Statute—Enumerated Instances.—The Legislature, in their description of offences which constitute murder in the first degree, has at first enumerated some of the most striking instances of deliberate and cruel homicide; but, finding it

†Murder in First Degree—What Constitutes—Premeditated Design—How Long It Must Exist.—In Wright v. Com., 75 Va. 920, it was said: "It was held by this court, in Whiteford v. Com., 6 Rand. 721, which case has been followed ever since as correctly laying down the law of murder, that the premeditated design to kill need not to have existed any particular length of time, but if the design at the time of killing was then formed, and the killing was done without provocation then or recently received, it is murder in the first degree. This decision has been followed in many cases. See Jones' Case, 1 Leigh 598; Howell's Case, 26 Gratt. 995; Mitchell's Case, 33 Gratt. 872, and cases referred to in these cases." And in McDaniel v. Com., 77 Va. 284, it is said: "Now to constitute a 'wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing,' it is necessary that the killing should have been done on purpose, and not by accident, or without design; that the accused must have reflected with a view to determine whether he would kill or not, and that he must have determined to kill, as the result of that reflection, before he does the act—that is to say, the killing must be a predetermined impossible to enumerate all of them, then proceeded, by general words, to embrace all kinds of wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing. It is improper to interpolate the word "such," in that general description.

Murder in Second Degree.—Instances:—The offence of homicide, by a workman throwing timber from a house into the street of a populous city, without warning, or of a person shooting at a fowl animo furandi, and killing a man, are instances of murder in the second degree.

This was an application for a Writ of Error to a Judgment rendered against Joseph Whiteford, the petitioner, by 722 the *Superior Court of Chesterfield, on the 15th November, 1828, sentencing him to be hanged by the neck until dead, for the murder of William Anderson. The case is fully stated in the following opinion of the Court.

Samuel Taylor for the petitioner.

The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

BROCKENBROUGH, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

The petitioner was indicted of the murder of William Anderson, by shooting him with a gun. The Jury convicted him of murder in the first degree, and he was sentenced to be hanged. During the trial, the Jury having retired to consult of their verdict, were for some time unable to agree, and came into Court to ask of the Judge to instruct them. He did accordingly instruct them, and the prisoner by his Counsel excepted to the Court's opinion, and it is that opinion which is now to be reviewed. He said to them, "that to constitute murder in the first degree with reference to this case, there must be a premeditated, or previously formed design to kill, but it is not necessary that this premeditated design to kill should have existed for any particular length of time. It is only necessary that it should be a course determinately fixed on, before the act done, and not brought about by provocation at the time of the act, or so recently before, as not to give time for reflection: neither is it necessary to prove this formed design by positive evidence: like every other fact, it may be established by circumstantial evidence, which, beyond rational doubt, convinces the minds of the Jury that this previous determination to kill did in fact exist. If the prisoner, as he approached the deceased, and when he first came in view of him, at the distance of about fifty yards, then formed the design, and came killing upon consideration, and not a sudden killing upon the momentary excitement and impulse of passion, upon provocation given at the time, or so recently before, as not to allow time for reflection: and this design to kill need not have existed for any particular length of time. It may be formed at the moment of the commission of the act. King's Case, and note, 2 Va. Cas. 84; Whiteford's Case, 6 Rand. 721; Jones's Case, 1 Leigh 598; Hill's Case, 2 Gratt. 525; Howell's Case, 26 Gratt. 995; Wright's Case, 33 Gratt. 881; Wright's Case, 75 Va. R. 914." On the same subject, the principal case is cited in Com. v. Jones, 1 Leigh 812; Howell v. Com., 26 Gratt. 1007; Price v. Com., 77 Va. 396. No particular length of time for deliberation or premeditation is necessary to constitute murder in the first degree. State v. Welch, 36 W. Va. 701, 15 S. E. Rep. 422.

*Murder.—See monographic note on "Homicide" appended to Souther v. Com., 7 Gratt. 673.

*Murder in the Second Degree.—Instances.—For the instances of murder in the second degree set out in the last headnote, the principal case is cited in State v. Morrison, 49 W. Va. 210, 38 S. E. Rep. 483.

to the determination to kill the deceased, and in pursuance *of this design, walked in a quick pace, the said distance of fifty yards, and killed the deceased, without any provocation then received, it was murder in the first degree."

Murder is defined to be the killing any reasonable creature in being, "with malice aforethought, expressed, or implied;" and there cannot be any doubt, that at Common Law, if one man kills another without a previously formed design to kill, that it is murder, although the design may have been formed only the moment before the fatal act is committed: and if there be no provocation whatever given at the time of the act, or if the provocation be very slight, and the act be committed with such weapon as is calculated to produce death, or if there have been a provocation, so long before the act, as that the blood has had time to cool, and the mind to reflect, and the deadly purpose is then effected, it is murder. But, it is urged by the Counsel for the prisoner, that such a killing is not murder in the first degree: that the Legislature have enumerated particular cases which constitute murder in the first degree: thus, that murder perpetrated by means of poison, by lying in wait, or by duress of imprisonment, or confinement, or by starving, or by wilful, malicious and excessive whipping, beating, or other cruel treatment, or torture, is murder in the first degree; that a general provision is then made, that murder, by any other kind of wilful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, shall be murder in the first degree; 1st Rev. Code, p. 616; and it is argued, that the word "such" ought to be interpolated, so as to make it "any other such kind of wilful, deliberate, and premeditated killing;" and that without such interpolation, the previous particular enumeration was unnecessary.

We do not see the propriety of that interpolation. We do not think that the intention of the Legislature, or the interest of society, requires that the Judiciary should interpose a word which the Legislature have not thought proper to use. They have enumerated some of the most 724 *striking instances of deliberate, cruel, and premeditated homicide; but, finding that a particular enumeration of all the instances which may happen in the ever-varying circumstances in which men are placed, would be impracticable, they have by general words declared, that all kinds of wilful, deliberate, and premeditated killing shall be murder in the first degree. The enquiry, then, always must be, is the killing wilful, deliberate, and determined on before the act. If it is, it proves that degree of malice which places the act in the highest grade of the offence. If a man wilfully and deliberately points a pistol, or a gun, which he knows to be loaded with powder and ball, at another's head, or heart, fires it, and kills him, not having received any provocation from him, surely there is as much malignity in his heart, there is as little excuse for him, and there is evidence as wilful, deliberate, and premeditated a purpose to kill, as if he had waylaid him, or had imprisoned him, or starved him, without intending to kill. So, if there had been a previous provocation, but sufficient time had passed off to allow his blood to cool, and his reason to resume its influence, then the deliberate act of shooting down his adversary, with the determined purpose to kill him, is murder from malice aforethought. Every act of murder, which the Jury are satisfied is of the character mentioned in the general clause, must be murder in the first degree, although the preparation for the fatal act may not have been so long present to the mind, nor the means of producing death so long protracted, as in the enumerated cases.

There are many instances in which the act would not be considered so wilful, deliberate and premeditated, as to make it murder in the first degree; yet, it would be murder at Common Law, and, therefore, by the Statute, would be considered as murder in the second degree. If a workman throws a stone, or a piece of timber from a house, in a populous city, into the street, where he knows people are passing, and gives them no warning, and kills 725 a man, it is *murder; yet, if it is from criminal carelessness instead of a wilful design to kill, or do great bodily harm, it is murder in the second degree: so if a person shoots at a fowl with the felonious intent of stealing it, and kills a person, he is guilty of murder, but it wants the ingredient of a wilful killing, and, therefore, is only in the second degree. But, these are acts very different from those which the instruction supposes.

The latter part of the instruction seems to have been intended to apply to the very case then before the Court. It may be supposed that when the Judge said, that if the prisoner, when he first saw the deceased at a short distance, then formed the design of killing him, and in pursuance of that design, stepped up to him, and shot him, "without any provocation then received," that he was guilty of murder in the first degree; that he did not, in his instruction, provide for the case of a provocation recently before that time received; so recently as that there was no time for reflection, nor for the blood to cool. If this part of the instruction stood alone, we should question its correctness; but, it would not be treating the Court fairly to separate it from its context. It must be taken in connection with the first part of the instruction. The Judge had almost in the same breath explained the effect of a recent provocation, and the latter part is explained by the former part of the instruction. We see no error in the opinion given.

The other error suggested in this Record, to wit, that the Judgment was rendered after the Term of the Court had been legally ended, has been fully considered, and just decided in Mendum's Case, and the reasoning of the Court need not be now repeated. The Court is unanimously of opinion, that there was no error in the instruction given; and a large majority is of opinion, that the second error assigned is not tenable. The Writ of Error is, therefore, refused.

726 *The Commonwealth v. Conrad Webb.

November, 1828.

Public Nuisance—Indictment—Sufficiency of—Case at Bar.—In an indictment for a public nuisance in damming up and stagnating the waters of a creek, whereby the air is corrupted and infected, and sends forth noisome and unwholesome smells, it is not sufficient to lay it to the common nuisance of "all the citizens of the Commonwealth, not only residing and inhabiting there, but also going, returning, passing and re-passing by the same," nor to the common nuisance "of all the citizens of the Commonwealth;" but to maintain a public prosecution for a nuisance, it is necessary to allege and prove, that the obstructions placed in the creek, produced a stagnation of the waters, and corrupted the air, in or near a public highway, or in some other place in which the public have a special interest.

This was an adjourned case from the Superior Court of Nottoway. The opinion of the Judge gives a full statement of the case.

Spooner and Johnson, argued the case for the Defendant, and the Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

DANIEL, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Defendant was presented by the Grand Jury for the Superior Court of Nottoway County, for a public nuisance, in erecting a mill-dam across Little Creek, in the said County, without lawful authority.

On this Presentment, an Information was filed containing two counts, charging in both, that by means of the said dam, the waters of the said creek had been rendered stagnant, and the air impure; concluding the first, to the common nuisance of all the citizens of the Commonwealth, residing in the neighborhood; and concluding the second, to the common nuisance of the inhabitants around the pond, naming them particularly, and all other citizens of the neighborhood. To this Information, the Defendant pleaded not guilty, on which issue was taken, and two trials were had before the Jury, who, in both instances, disagreed.

727 *At a subsequent Term, the Attorney for the Commonwealth, by leave of the Court, amended his Information, charging in substance the same fact, and concluding the first count, "to the great damage, and common nuisance of all the good citizens of this Commonwealth, not only there residing and inhabiting, but also going, returning, passing and re-passing by the neighborhood of the said pond;" the other count concludes, "to the common nuisance of all the citizens of the Commonwealth."

To this Information, the Defendant demurred generally, and the Attorney for the Commonwealth joined in the Demurrer. The said Superior Court adjourned the case to this Court for novelty and difficulty, on the question, "What Judgment ought to be given upon the said Demurrer?"

The decision of this question calls for a more precise discrimination between public and private nuisances, than was necessary for the decision of the case of the Commonwealth against Faris, 5 Rand. p. 691.

In making this discrimination, the Court has been ably assisted by the Attorney General, and the Counsel for the Defendant, and the conclusion to which the Court has arrived, is this: That to constitute a public nuisance, the act done, or duty omitted, must affect injuriously, something, or right, in which the community as a body politic, have a common interest, and the facts producing this injury, and connecting it with such special public right, or interest, must be both alleged, and proved. To carry this matter further, would obliterate every line that now marks the difference between public and private wrongs. The community have an interest in the preservation of the health and lives of its members; they have a right to see and provide that each shall breathe the air as pure as nature gives it. But this interest, and this right, in no manner differs from the interest in, and right to secure, the welfare of all its members, in every private relation. Both are provided for by private actions, or public prosecutions, according to *the nature of the case. As it regards the case before us, we find it every where laid down, that things done, or duties omitted, which affect the public interest, are public nuisances; those, on the contrary, which affect particular individuals, are private nuisances, and redressed by private actions. We cannot find in any decided case, the precise question before us considered, but this results from the fact, that no attempt has been made to maintain a public prosecution for a nuisance, arising from a local fixture, the effects of which are not alleged, and proved, to be injurious to some distinct public right or interest, as contradistinguished from that interest which the public have in each of its members enjoying his own right. No precedent can be found of a prosecution of this character, which is not distinctly based on this idea. No adjudicated case condemns the allegations which thus connect the fact with the public interest, as a surplusage or unnecessary.

But, it has been strongly argued, that notwithstanding these averments are constantly found in the Indictments, in the reasoning of the Judges upon the actual wrong committed, the principal stress seems to be laid on the injury done to the neighbouring inhabitants, and the inconvenience to the public by the effect produced on highways, &c., is lightly regarded; from hence this public injury is called the shadow, while the injury to the neighbours is the real substance whereon the public prosecution is founded. It is readily conceded, that on the question of the quantum of punishment, this argument is generally substantially correct, but we should find no difficulty in confining this punishment to the public grievance only, in every case where the parties more immediately concerned, are prosecuting their private remedies, or will not forego them. The practice of the Courts, on Indictments for breaches of the peace, furnishes the rule which should govern in such cases. The fact, that the injury to surrounding individuals is principally regarded in estimating the grade of the Defendant's delinquency, may be well likened to 729 the action *of a father for debauching his daughter and servant, whereby he lost her service, the latter is the gist of the action, without which it cannot be maintained; but, in estimating the damages, the injury to the feelings and character of the father and his family, together with the decree of impropriety of the Defendant's conduct, are almost exclusively regarded. The necessity of thus restricting public prosecutions for nuisances, is strongly enforced by a rule of Law, which we find no where contradicted, that no private action can be maintained for a public nuisance, without special damage done to the party complaining. By special damage, we understand, an injury different in kind from that of which the public complains. If a local fixture, which renders the air impure, or uncomfortable to a neighbourhood, without affecting any public right, as before described, could be made the subject of a public prosecution, it must be because all the citizens of the Commonwealth are liable to be so affected. The injury thus sustained by any particular individual, is of the same kind with that to which the public are thus liable, arising from the same cause, and affecting the same local situation. From the above rule it follows, that if this be a public offence, no private action in such case could be maintained; but, if we suppose that the public prosecution is founded on the injurious effects of such fixture on the highway, or other public right, then the private individual, who, on his own land, off the said highway, sustains an injury from the same fixture, on account of its injurious effects on his habitation, complains not at all of an injury common to himself and the rest of the community, but of one to himself alone, and for which he of course may have his private remedy. For these reasons, we conclude, in the language of some of the Judges who decided the aforesaid case of the Commonwealth against Faris, that to support the prosecution, on the Information before us, it ought to be alleged and proved, that the obstructions placed in Little Creek, in the County of Nottoway, produced a stagnation 730 *of the waters thereof, in or near a public highway, or some other place, in which the public have such special interest. The general conclusion, that the stagnation of the said waters does injure all the citizens of the Commonwealth, will not cure the want of such special averment, because the facts stated do not warrant that conclusion. The attempt made, in some of the Books referred to, to reconcile the cases, which require this precise conclusion, with those which regard the Indictment as good without, is unsatisfactory. It supposes, that the general conclusion is called for only in cases where the public nature to the offence is not alleged in the special averments with sufficient certainty, but no where supposes that the absence of such averments may be so supplied.

The consequence is, that the amended information filed in this case is not sufficient, and that the Defendant's Demurrer to it should be sustained, and Judgment rendered for him.

731 *The Commonwealth v. Robert Craig & al., Sureties of Laney Gentry.

November, 1828.

Recognizance—Rule against Sureties—Witness.—In a recognizance of bail, for the appearance of a prisoner to answer an indictment, if the principal be bound in a particular sum, and the sureties be separately bound in a like sum, and the principal make default, upon a rule against the sureties to show cause why a Sci. Fa. should not be awarded against them, the principal recognizer is not a competent witness for them to show that the Sci. Fa. should not be awarded.

Same—Principal Sick—Effect.—If at a subsequent Term, of a Court after the default of the principal has been recorded, the sureties, on a rule against them, can show to the satisfaction of the Court, that the principal was rendered unable to appear at the proper Court, by reason of wounds, and sickness, the Court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may spare the recognizance, and decline awarding the Sci. Fa. especially if the prisoner be then in custody to answer the indictment.

Same—Same—Showing Cause against Rule—Affidavits—Admissibility of.—In showing cause against the rule, affidavits are admissible, without requiring the presence of the witnesses in Court, if the Court be satisfied that they have been fairly taken.

This is an adjourned case from the Superior Court of Montgomery. The case is fully stated in the following opinion.

BROCKENBROUGH, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.

The Defendant had been indicted for bigamy in Montgomery Superior Court, and by order of that Court he had entered into a recognizance in the sum of $500, with sundry sureties in a like sum, before two Justices in September, 1827, conditioned for his appearance at the next Term of the said Court, to be held in April, 1828, to answer to the Indictment, and not to depart thence without leave of the Court. At the ensuing Term he failed to appear, and his default was recorded. A rule was then entered against him, and his sureties, returnable to the next Term in September, to show cause why a Scire Facias should not be awarded against him, and them. At the following Term in September, 1828, he appeared in custody, and on the motion of the Attorney for the Commonwealth, 732 he was "taken into custody. The sureties then offered him as a witness to prove, that some time previous to the April Term, when he ought to have appeared, he has been engaged in a rencontre, by which he was so severely wounded and maimed that his life was despaired of, and he was thereby rendered unable to attend at the April Term agreeably to his recognizance. They also offered to prove by sundry affidavits, and other evidence, that he was rendered unable by the causes aforesaid, to attend. Whereupon, the Superior Court adjourned to this Court the following questions for decision:

1st. Is the said Laney Gentry a competent witness to prove his inability to attend, and ought the Court to hear him on this motion?

2d. If the affidavits to prove his crippled and wounded state, and his inability to attend, is that a sufficient excuse to discharge the sureties from their recognizance, and ought the Court to discharge them, upon the above facts being proved, either by Gentry, or other evidence?

3d. Are affidavits sufficient, without requiring the presence of the witnesses in Court?

On the first question, the Court is of opinion that the said Gentry is not a competent witness in behalf of his sureties, seeing that by discharging them, he discharges himself from the payment of the sum for which the sureties are bound to the Commonwealth. If they should be compelled to pay the amount of the recognizance for which they are bound, they, as his sureties, would have a right to recover from him the amount so paid. Although he does not discharge himself, by his evidence in their favor, from the $500 for which he is severally bound, yet by discharging them from the payment of the like sum for which they are bound, he prevents them from recovering against himself the said sum, and therefore is directly interested.

On the second question, it appears clear that the Courts of Oyer and Terminer have the right, at any time before 733 *a recognizance is estreated, either to estreat, or spare it. This is a discretion vested in them, for the obvious purpose of remitting the obligation in a hard case. Estreats are strictly speaking, not known in this State, but by analogy to the practice in England, the Courts here, have certainly the power to spare the recognizance, at least, at any time before the Scire Facias awarded. If the Court of Montgomery was satisfied by competent evidence, that the recognizer was disabled by his wounds from attending the Court, it is reasonable and just that his misfortune should not be visited upon him, and his sureties, particularly, as by his appearance afterwards, the ends of public justice will be answered: and in such case, the Court ought not to award any Sci. Fa. against them.

3. As a motion like the present is addressed to the sound discretion of the Court, and there is yet no suit depending in which witnesses could be required to attend, by any compulsory process, it is proper to receive either affidavits, or the testimony of witnesses examined in open Court, or both, as may be convenient. The Court should be well satisfied, in relation to the proof by affidavits, that they have been fairly taken, and show fully and clearly the matter relied upon as cause for sparing the recognizance.

The Judgment of this Court is to be certified to the Superior Court of Montgomery, conformably to the opinion now expressed.

APPENDIX.

¹²⁷ The two following Cases, which were decided in August, 1827, were not intended for publication, because the Court consisted of only three members, and one of the Judges dissented from his brethren on one of the important points decided. But as the question discussed and decided by the two Judges, are of great importance, and reference has been had to them in subsequent Cases, it has been recently thought advisable to report them.

Thomas Shirley v. Joshua Long.

August, 1827.

Insolvent Debtor—What Property Vests in Sheriff.*—

When a debtor takes the insolvent oath, and delivers in a schedule, the Sheriff is vested, by the Act of Assembly, with all the insolvent's estate, rights and interests, whether they are named in the schedule, or not, and whether the property be in the possession of the debtor, or in that of any other person.

Same—Same—Statute—Construction*—Case at Bar.—

The clause of the Act, "for such interest therein as such prisoner hath, and may lawfully part withal," is borrowed from the English Statutes of Bankruptcy, and has been used in all of our Insolvent Laws, from 1726 to 1748, inclusive, as applying to partial interests in real estate, such as fees tail, life estates, estates for years, remainders, reversions, &c., and not to personal estate. It is still to be so understood in the Act of 1769, and in the Revised Laws of 1792 and 1819, and is not to be taken as a restriction on the vesting in the Sheriff of the whole of the debtor's chattels, whether he may part with, or deliver possession of them, or not. Therefore, if an insolvent debtor, having made a fraudulent gift of a slave to a child, still retaining possession thereof, in his schedule disclaims all title to the said slave, the Law vests in the Sheriff the legal title to the slave, the gift being void, and he may recover it in a Court of Law from the debtor.

Same—Rights of Sheriff—Sale of Property by.*—The Sheriff has the right to sell, and to pass by Deed, a slave, or other chattel, which the insolvent debtor has made a fraudulent gift of to his child, (but of which he retains the possession,) and the purchaser under such sale may recover the slave, or other chattel, although the Sheriff had not possession of it, at any time. By two JUDGES, CARR and GREEN. JUDGE CABELL dissented.

Same—Same—Same.*—If the property so fraudulently given, be not in the possession of the insolvent debtor, but of some other person, although the title vests in the Sheriff, it seems that he cannot sell the property in such case, but must proceed by summons against the person holding it, under the 35th and 36th sections of the Act.

⁷⁸⁶ Same—Same—Same—Effect.*—But, even if the spirit of the Act were violated by selling the chattels of the insolvent, before they come into the possession of the Sheriff, yet as the legal title is vested in him, if he does sell, the sale is not void, and the purchaser may recover. The Sheriff is a Trustee for the creditors and for a violation of his trust, he may be responsible, but that does not prevent the legal title from passing to the purchaser. By two Judges.

Same—Same—Same—Deed from Sheriff—Description—Sufficiency of.*—A Deed from a Sheriff, which con-

Insolvent Debtor—What Property Vests in Sheriff—Right to Sue for Property.—For the proposition that upon taking the oath of insolvency, all the property and rights of the insolvent debtor are immediately vested by operation of law in the sheriff, who as representing the creditors, is entitled to assert the legal and equitable rights of the creditors, and to set aside fraudulent conveyances of the insolvent, and recover the property for the benefit of the creditors, the principal case is cited with approval in Tate v. Liggott, 2 Leigh 106; Beverley v. Brooke, 2 Leigh 448; Ruffners v. Lewis, 7 Leigh 738; Staton v. Pittman, 11 Gratt. 103.

Where a person taken in execution is discharged as an insolvent debtor, the estate in lands belonging to him at the time of such discharge is, by the act in 1 R. C. of 1819, ch. 184 § 34, p. 538, so completely vested in the sheriff of the county wherein such lands lie, that an ejectment for such lands veys all "the right, title and interest, vested in the Sheriff by Law, in and to eight negroes, conveyed by a debtor to his children," without naming the negroes is sufficiently descriptive to pass them. The identity of the negroes is matter of proof, and as soon as they are identified, the Deed operates on them.

Thomas Shirley brought Detinue in the Superior Court of Law for Spottsylvania County, against Joshua Long, to recover a slave, named Sarah. The general issue was pleaded, and on the trial, the Plaintiff tendered a Bill of Exceptions, which was signed and sealed by the Court. It set forth, that the Plaintiff gave in evidence, a copy of the schedule of the Defendant, who had taken the oath of an insolvent debtor on the 23d June, 1821. The schedule, after giving a list of various tracts of land, lots, houses, and sundry articles of personal property and slaves, all variously incumbered, and divers rights and interests, thus proceeds: "The above is and every thing that can recollect except eight negroes give to my four oldest children, Durrett, William, Elizabeth, and Joanna; their names in the writing that they have in positions (possession.) I disclaim all title to this property, those who claim it for me must contest the right of my children under the conveyances which are older than any of those claims." The Justices who administered the oath, certified, at the foot of the schedule, that no property was delivered to the Sheriff, they deeming it unnecessary. The Plaintiff also gave in evidence, a Deed from the Sheriff of Spottsylvania to the Plaintiff, dated 8th November, 1821, reciting, that Long had taken the oath, and been discharged as an insolvent debtor, and had given in his schedule, and had, on the 23d June, 1821, conveyed to the said Sheriff all the lands comprised in the schedule, and that the Sheriff had proceeded to sell, after due advertisement, on the 17th August, 1821, ⁷³⁷ "to the highest bidder, for cash," "all the property contained in the said schedule, subject to all claims, charges, and incumbrances, existing upon the said property, or any part thereof;" and that the Plaintiff became the purchaser of all the right, title and interest which the said Sheriff had, by virtue of the premises, in and to the following property, to wit: "One tract of land," &c. (specifying two tracts, and a house and lot and wharf, in Fredericksburg.) also, all right or interest arising from the property named in the following sentences written in

A contract, &c.; also, the following slaves, to wit, Moses, &c.; also, all the said Joshua Long's interest in the estate of Durrett Long; all his interest in Eli Austin's estate; all his interest in some leather; all his interest in his growing crops; also, a yoke of oxen; all his interest in the estate of William Long; and all his interest in eight slaves conveyed to his children, and all his interest in the real estate and personal estate conveyed to R. Patton, &c." for the sum of fifty-eight dollars and fifty cents. The Deed then proceeds: "Now this Indenture witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the premises, and of the said sum of money to me (the said Sheriff) in hand paid, I have granted, bargained and sold, transferred and assigned, and by these presents do grant, bargain and sell, transfer and assign, to the said Thomas Shirley, his heirs, &c., all the right, title and interest which is vested in me by virtue of the Deed aforesaid, from Joshua Long to me, or by virtue of the Act of Assembly for the relief of insolvent debtors, both in Law, and Equity, of, in, and to all the real and personal estate, so as aforesaid described, as purchased by the said Thomas Shirley."

The Plaintiff also gave evidence to prove, that for several years before Long swore out of Jail, the negro Sarah, mentioned in the Declaration, was in the possession of Long, and he exercised over her the same acts of ownership as he did over his others slaves: that she was in his possession at the time he took the insolvent debtor's oath, and thereafter, 738 *till after the institution of this suit; and that Joanna Long, his daughter, in 1821, was eighteen or twenty years of age, and lived as she had always lived in her father's family. The Defendant proved by a witness, Mrs Proctor, that she, about the year 1815, hired Sarah from Joshua Long, as the property of his daughter Joanna, and Joshua Long told her she might keep her until Joanna came of age, or married, or demanded her: that she kept the slave eighteen or nineteen months, and then returned her to Joshua Long, and paid the hire to Mrs Long, the wife of Joshua Long, in butter, fowls, and other necessities for the family. Other witnesses, on the part of the Defendant proved, that about the time of his hiring Sarah to Mrs Proctor, and up to 1817, he said he had given Sarah to his daughter Joanna. On the part of the Plaintiff, the Overseers of Long, (one of whom boarded in his house in 1819,) were examined, and testified that they, from 1817 to 1821, never heard the slave Sarah represented in the family as the property of Joanna.

The Counsel for the Defendant, thereupon moved the Court to instruct the Jury, that the said slave Sarah was not included in the aforesaid schedule, and that the Plaintiff acquired no right or title to the said slave, either by the schedule, or the Deed aforesaid from the Sheriff to the Plaintiff, which instruction the Court gave.

And thereupon, the Plaintiff offered to prove, that the said slave Sarah was sold, (at the same sale at which all of the estate of the said Long, under the schedule aforesaid, was sold, and as part of the said insolvent's estate,) by the said Sheriff of Spottsylvania, (he not being in possession of the said slave,) and purchased by the Plaintiff. But the Court being of opinion, that any interest of the said insolvent debtor, not contained in his schedule, could not pass from the Sheriff to the purchaser, except by Deed, and that the Deed aforesaid did not pass his interest in the said slave, refused to permit the Plaintiff to prove the same to the Jury. To which opinions, and in-739 struction of the *Court, the Plaintiff excepted. Verdict and Judgment were rendered for the Defendant, to which Judgment the Plaintiff obtained a Supersedeas from this Court.

August 22. JUDGE CARR.

After stating the case, he proceeded:

The Court instruct the Jury, that the slave Sarah was not included in the schedule. By this I understand the Judge to mean, (not that Sarah was not one of the eight slaves which the schedule mentions as having been given to Long's children, this being a question for the Jury exclusively,) but I presume he intended to say, that the insolvent, in his schedule, disclaiming all title to these eight slaves, Sarah, as one of them, could not be claimed by the Sheriff, in virtue of the schedule.

I do not consider the Sheriff as claiming under the schedule at all, but under the Law. That vests in him all the estate of the prisoner, as well that left out of the schedule, as that included in it. The schedule was necessary to bind the insolvent, for he swears it contains all his estate of every kind: it was proper, also, as a guide to the Sheriff, because the prisoner must be supposed to know best, what and where his property was: but the schedule neither gave to the Sheriff any right to the property it contained, nor limited his rights to its contents. Immediately on the insolvent's taking the oath, the Law divests him of everything but his necessary apparel, and utensils of trade, and casts upon the Sheriff, all his estate, rights, and interests. This has been the Law ever since 1769. 8 Hen. Stat. 326. Nor was there at any time before January 4th, 1799, any Statute requiring the prisoner to deliver up the personal, or convey the real, estate. An incon-740 venience *arose, however, from the difficulty the Sheriff sometimes encountered, in finding and getting into his actual possession, the personal property; and to remedy this, a section was added to the Execution Law, in the Session of 1798-9, saying, that all the personal estate contained in the schedule, shall be transferred and delivered by the debtor, and all the real estate conveyed to the Sheriff, under the direction of the Court, or persons administering the oath, before such insolvent debtor shall be discharged. Why the conveyance of the real estate was required, it is difficult to imagine; for the Law had already completely conveyed it: the title was of record, and the land could not be removed. It certainly was not its purpose, or effect, to narrow the operation of the Law, which vests in the Sheriff, "all the estate which shall be contained in such schedule; and any other estate which may be discovered to belong to the prisoner." These are the very words which have been in every Revisal from 1769 to the present day. The section introduced in the Session of 1798-9, I consider as merely directory to the Court, or Magistrates, before whom the oath is taken. And though the prisoner should be released without delivering up an atom of his personal goods, or conveying a foot of his land, the whole of both would be completely vested in the Sheriff. The Court, then, in deciding that the slave Sarah was not included in the schedule, settled a question of no moment in the cause. But the Court further instructed the Jury, that the Plaintiff acquired no right or title to Sarah, by the Deed from the Sheriff to the Plaintiff, and refused to admit evidence to prove that she was actually sold among the other property, being of opinion, that not being in the schedule, she could only pass from the Sheriff to the purchaser by Deed, and that the Deed aforesaid did not pass her. In my mind, her being in or out of the schedule, cannot make a Deed more or less necessary to pass the Sheriff's right and title to the purchaser. However this may be, the Plaintiff claims under the Deed alone, and by that he must stand or fail.

741 *In considering whether Sarah passed to the Plaintiff by the Sheriff's Deed, we must take these facts for granted: 1st: That Sarah is one of the eight slaves whom the Defendant, in his schedule says he had given to his children by conveyance, older than the claims of his creditors; 2d. That she had continued in his possession, and was used as his own property up to the bringing this suit; 3d. That Sarah was actually sold by the Sheriff to the Plaintiff, according to the forms of the Act of Assembly. It is proper to take these facts as proved in testing the correctness of the Court's opinion; because, being matters for the Jury, if the proof of them to the Jury's satisfaction, would have rendered the opinion improper, it ought not to have been given. If the Deed of the Sheriff did not pass to the Plaintiff, any title in the slave Sarah, it must be either, 1st. Because he had no title to pass; or, 2d. Because the Deed was not sufficient in Law to pass his title.

1st. As to the Sheriff's title. "All the estate which shall be contained in such schedule, and any other estate which may be discovered to belong to the prisoner, for such interest therein as such prisoner hath, and may lawfully depart withal, shall be vested in the Sheriff of the County wherein such lands, tenements, goods and chattels shall lie, or be found." Does this Act vest in the Sheriff, title to a slave which the prisoner states in his schedule that he has given to a child by Deed, but which Deed has never been recorded, and the possession of which slave has always remained with the donor? Now we know, that both by the Act of 1787, ch. 22, concerning gifts of slaves, and by the Statute of Frauds, such a gift would be void: but it is said, that the estate of the prisoner vests in the Sheriff only for such interest therein as such prisoner hath, and may lawfully depart withal, and that these words do not comprehend an interest like this, claimed by another under a Deed from the prisoner, and disclaimed by the prisoner himself. If this be so, it must strike every one, that there is a glaring defect in 742 this Law. The insolvent *debtor is in that very situation which holds out the strongest temptations to make a fraudulent disposition of his property, upon secret trust, to friends or children: the Law comes in to the aid of creditors, takes from the prisoner all his property, rights and interests, and vests them for the creditors in the Sheriff, makes him the Trustee of the creditors, the only medium through which they can vindicate their rights, or question the veracity of the prisoner's oath; and yet this Trustee, has no power vested in him to claim, for the creditors, property fraudulently given away, or colorably disposed of by the prisoner, provided he disclaims in his schedule any interest in such property, and another claims it!

The resemblance, which the Sheriff's character, in cases of insolvency, bears to that of assignees, in bankruptcy, naturally turns our attention to those Laws, and we were referred to them in the argument, as containing language similar to that of our Statute. In Cook's and Cooper's "Bankrupt Laws," these Acts are set out at large. In 34 and 35 H. 8, (the oldest Statute of Bankrupts, and said to be the foundation of all the rest,) we have, first, a statement of the mischiefs to be removed, then the Act declares, that the Lord Chancellor, (and others named,) upon complaint made in writing, shall have power and authority, to take by their wisdoms and discretion, such orders, &c., as well with the bodies of such offenders, &c., as also with their lands, tenements, fees, annuities, and offices, which they have in fee simple, fee tail, term of life, term of years, or in right of their wives, as much of the interest, right and title of the same offender shall extend, or be, and may then lawfully be departed with, by the said offender: and also with their money, goods, chattels, wares, merchandizes, and debts, wheresoever they may be found or known. And to cause their said lands, &c., goods, &c., to be searched, viewed, rented and appraised, and to make sale of the said lands, tenements, fees, annuities, and offices, as much as the same of-

743 fender may then lawfully *give, grant, or depart with; or otherwise, to order the same, for true satisfaction, and payment of the said creditors. The Statute 13th Eliz. ch. 7th, after enumerating those which shall be considered acts of bankruptcy, empowers the Chancellor, or Keeper, to appoint Commissioners, upon any complaint made, &c., who shall have power, &c., to take, order, &c., with the bodies of such bankrupts, &c., as also with all his or her lands, tenements, hereditaments, as well copy, or customary hold, as freehold, which he or she shall have in his or her own right, before he or she became bankrupt, and also with all such lands, tenements, and hereditaments, as such person shall have purchased or obtained for money, or other recompence, jointly with his wife, children or child, to the only use of such offender, or offenders, or of, or for such use, interest, right or title, as such offender then shall have in the same, which he may lawfully depart withal, &c. And also with his money, goods, chattels, wares, merchandises and debts, whosoever they may be found, or known, &c. In these Statutes, we find the very words which have been introduced into our Insolvent Laws, for such interest therein as such prisoner hath, and may lawfully depart withal: and we find them applied solely to real estate, intended to describe those lesser estates, and partial interests, which a man may hold in lands and tenements, either by himself, or jointly with others: to goods and chattels they are not applied in the slightest degree; nor indeed could they, for in that day there was no such partial interest in personal estate known to the Law: passing the title for an hour, passed it for ever.

If we look into our early Insolvent Laws, we find it equally clear, that these words were intended to apply to real estate exclusively. Thus, in the Act of 1726, (Hen. Stat. vol. 4, 166,) sec. 31, it is enacted, "That all the lands, tenements and hereditaments, which shall be contained in such schedule, for such use, 744 interest, right or title, as such prisoner then shall have in the same, *which he or she may lawfully depart withal; and also, all goods and chattels whatsoever, in such schedule also contained, shall be vested in the Sheriff of the County," &c. The words here, can only be applied to real estate. The same words are repeated in the Law of 1748, and again in a Bankrupt Law, passed in November, 1762, but repealed in May, 1763, before it had gone into operation. In the subsequent Revisals, instead of keeping the subject of real and personal estate separate, they are blended into one sentence; ("all the estate, &c.") and the words "for such interest therein, as such prisoner hath and may lawfully depart withal," are so used, as to render it doubtful at first view, whether they do not apply as well to personal, as to real estate: but when we consider, that the words are taken literally from the Bankrupt Laws; that in our Laws, they were used in exactly the same sense; that as applied to real estate, they have a clear meaning, and an effect in accordance with justice, and the other enactments of the Law; but, that if we understand them as applicable to personality and say that wherever the debtor has made a fraudulent disposition of goods, which would bind him, it shall bind the Sheriff, and consequently the creditors, we make the Law defeat its own purposes, and commit rank injustice. When we look at these consequences, I think we are bound to conclude, that no change in the application of the words was intended; but, that this blending of the two subjects, has proceeded from inattention, added to that desire to condense, so visible in our Revisal; and which, in other instances, is carried so far, as to sacrifice, in some degree, clearness to brevity. This renders it often necessary to the understanding of a Law, that we should look back to its origin, and trace its progress; and for this purpose, the Statutes at Large by Henning, are invaluable. I consider these words, then, as applying only to real estate, and meaning to say, that the same quantity of estate, which the insolvent possessed in his own right, shall vest in the Sheriff for the creditors. As to the personality, I

745 *consider the Statute as vesting in the Sheriff, for the benefit of the creditors, all the rights, interests and property of the insolvent. In this respect, the Sheriff, I think, occupies a station, and performs functions a good deal like those of assignees of bankrupts, and the English Cases might be referred to. I believe, however, there are not many that turn on the power of assignees to set aside fraudulent conveyances made by bankrupts; for, one of their early Statutes declared a fraudulent conveyance to be itself an act of bankruptcy, which of course would overreach and avoid the conveyance. In Anderson v. Maltby, 2 Ves. jr. 244, the Lord Chancellor says, "The assignees have all the equity the creditors have, and may impeach transactions which the bankrupt himself would be stopped from impeaching." This applies equally to the Sheriff: indeed, the doctrine seems to me to stand on the plainest principles of reason, law, and justice. The Sheriff is interposed by the Law, to receive, secure and distribute, among the proper creditors, all the estate of the insolvent. He represents both the insolvent and the creditors. Would it not be strange, then, to say, that if the insolvent were to convey away half his property, and this most manifestly fraudulent, this curator and trustee, could do nothing, bring no suit, take no step to recover this, and bring it into a division among the creditors? He is a poor representative, if this be so, and the Law has done little in raising him up to protect the interests of the creditors. They could have taken much better care of themselves. I consider it clear Law, then, that under the Act of Assembly, the Sheriff is vested with all the property and rights of the insolvent; and that as representing the creditors, and possessing their legal and equitable rights, he may set aside fraudulent conveyances of the insolvent, and recover the property.

But it may be said, that even supposing the Sheriff has this right, he has not pursued it properly in this case: instead of suing to set aside the fraudulent gift, he has at 746 *once sold the slave. The same section which vests in the Sheriff all the estate of the insolvent, proceeds to say, "and such Sheriff is hereby authorised, empowered and required, within sixty days after the taking the said oath, ten days previous notice of the time and place of sale being given, to sell and convey the same to any person or persons whatsoever, for the best price that can be got for the same." It is said, however, that this sale is meant to embrace property only which is surrendered to the Sheriff, and to which there is no dispute: and that this is proved by the next section, which enacts, that when the debtor is discharged, and the schedule contains articles of money or tobacco, due to such prisoner, or goods, chattels or estates, belonging to him, in the possession of another, in that case the Clerk may, at the instance of the creditor issue a summons against each of the persons named as debtors, or who have possession of any goods, chattels or estates of the property of the prisoner, &c., going on to direct the manner of proceeding in such cases. There is another section, which gives the prisoner, in a certain case, the right to proceed against the garnishee, and another gives the right to any creditor, but I understand that all these proceedings must be in the name of the Sheriff, in whom all the rights and estate of the debtor are vested. As to the proceedings contemplated by these sections, against garnishees, it is clear to me, that the case before us does not come within them. They speak of property, which, by the schedule, the debtor claims, and states to be in the possession of another: here, the schedule disclaims all title to the slave, and she is not in the possession of another, but of the debtor himself. The Statute never meant that the Sheriff should issue a summons against the debtor himself, as garnishee, for property in his own possession. Of all such property, I have no doubt, the Sheriff might take possession, without any process. But has the Sheriff in such case, a right to sell such property, at the general sale of the insolvent's effects?

747 The schedule says, the *debtor has given her to his child; but she has remained in his possession: the Sheriff finds her there: the Law says such a gift passes no interest: if so, the property was in the insolvent, and the Law has cast it upon the Sheriff. What shall he do with her? Give her up to the child, and then sue for her, or hold her till the child may choose to sue him? I incline to think that the Sheriff would violate no duty, in selling such slave with the rest of the debtor's property. But, suppose that in selling her, while the claim hung over her, and she was not in his actual possession, the Sheriff violated the spirit and meaning of the Law, still I think that his sale and conveyance of her would transfer his title to the purchaser, if the Deed were sufficient in Law. I think so, because I consider the Sheriff completely clothed with the legal title; as much so as any Trustee whatever: and having the legal title, his Deed would convey it, though in doing so he violated his trust.

But, the question still remains—Is the Deed of the Sheriff sufficient in Law to convey the title of this slave to the Plaintiff? That such was the intention of the Deed, is expressed too clearly for doubt. If the intention be not effected, it must be because the description of the property is too uncertain. The Deed conveys "all the right, title and interest vested in the Sheriff, by the Act of Assembly for relief of insolvent debtors, both in Law and Equity, of, in, or to, eight negroes conveyed by Long to his children. The negroes here, are not named, to be sure; but, a name is only one kind of description, and any other which enables the parties to identify the property, will do. Long, in his schedule, says, there were eight negroes which he had given to his children, their names in the writing; the Deed of the Sheriff follows this description. Now, proof that this slave Sarah, is one of those given to the children, identifies her at once. The writing by which Long states that he conveyed the slaves, and in which they are named, is not produced, though it behoved the Defendant to have produced it, and he had notice to do so; but, he 748 himself supplied *evidence, by two or three, that they had often heard him declare, that he had given Sarah to his daughter Joanna; thus showing that she was one of the eight. This, however, was a question for the Jury. Upon the reason of the thing, I have no doubt that the description is certain enough to pass the property: the Law of the case is as clear as the reason. If a man bargain and sell all his land in D., the land will pass with all houses, woods, &c. 4 Co. 87, b.; Cro. Eliz. 476; 2 Roll's Abr. 49, 57; Owen, 75; Noy, 49; Cro. Eliz. 905; Perkins, 114. A mortgage of "all the lands, tenements and hereditaments to me belonging in the province of New-York," held to be good. Jackson v. De Lancey, 11 Johns. Rep. 365. Same Case, in Error, 13 Johns. 537. This Court has also decided the same principle in a case not long since. I think, therefore, that the instruction of the Court was wrong; that the Judgment must be reversed, and the cause sent back for a new trial, on which no such instructions are to be given.

JUDGE GREEN.

After a full statement, proceeded:

The Plaintiff rested his title upon these grounds: That Sarah was one of the slaves mentioned in the schedule and deed, under the description of eight slaves conveyed by Long to his four eldest children: that Long was in possession of the slave when he gave in his schedule, and continued in possession until after the suit brought: that the conveyance of the slave by Long to his daughter, Joanna, was fraudulent and void as to creditors, under the Statute of Frauds: that the legal title to the slave, whether she were contained in the schedule, or not, was vested by Law in the Sheriff: that the Sheriff sold and conveyed that legal title to him: and that the title passed effectually by the Deed to the Plaintiff. The Deed in terms conveys all the right, title and interest, vested in the Sheriff by the Act of Assembly, for 749 the relief of insolvent *debtors, in and to the eight slaves conveyed to his children by Long, and mentioned as so conveyed in his schedule. The Deed from Long to the Sheriff, professed only to convey the lands, and not any of the personal property mentioned in the schedule; and under that Deed, the Sheriff did not profess to claim title to any of the personal property mentioned in the schedule. The intent of the Sheriff's Deed to pass these negroes, if he had any right in him, is clear; and that the title to them would pass by the Deed, is equally clear. If the Sheriff had any title which he could transfer in this way to another, unless the Deed were void, as to these negroes, for uncertainty in the description of them. A conveyance of all my slaves, in such a County, or on such a plantation, or which are claimed under a Deed by such an one, or in the possession of such an one, or all my furniture, or plantation utensils, would be good. In all these cases, parol proofs must be resorted to, for the purpose of showing the identity of the property intended to be conveyed, and that being ascertained, the Deed would operate upon it. In a late case, it was decided here, that a Deed conveying property specified by particular names and description, and also, all the grantor's estate, passed his equitable right to a slave then in the adverse possession of another, and not named in the Deed. The Deed under consideration, is not so vague and uncertain in the description of the property intended to be conveyed, as that was, nor more so than in the cases above supposed. Proof that the slave in question was one of those conveyed by Long to his four elder children, and mentioned in his schedule, at once identified the property intended to be conveyed. Whether the proof offered on this point, was or was not sufficient to identify the property, was exclusively for the consideration of the Jury; and the opinion of the Court must be taken to be, that even if the property claimed was identified to be that intended to be conveyed, the Deed did not convey any title to it.

750 *If the Sheriff had title to the property in question, and it was embraced in the Deed, the title passed to the Plaintiff, unless the Sheriff was disabled by the Statute from transferring any title, vested in him, to property under the circumstances in which this was placed, that is to say, to property not in the possession of the Sheriff, but in that of the insolvent debtor, and claimed by another as belonging to him.

The Statute directs, "that before taking the oath prescribed, the prisoner shall subscribe, and deliver a schedule of his whole estate, and shall, before he shall be discharged, transfer and deliver, all the personal estate contained in the schedule, to the Sheriff of the County where it may lie or be found. And all the estate which shall be contained in such schedule, and any other estate which may be discovered to belong to the prisoner, for such interest therein as such prisoner hath, and may lawfully depart withal, shall be vested in the Sheriff of the County wherein such lands, tenements, goods or chattels, shall lie, or be found: and such Sheriff is hereby authorised, empowered, and required, within sixty days after taking the oath, ten days notice being given, to sell and convey the same to any person or persons whatsoever, for the best price that can be got for the same."

The Act further provides, that if the schedule contains any articles of money, or tobacco, due to the prisoner, or goods, chattels, or estates, belonging to him, in the possession of any other, the creditor may proceed upon summons against the garnishee, in the name of the Sheriff, for the recovery thereof, and the garnishee shall be called upon for a discovery on oath, and if judgment is obtained against the garnishee, the Sheriff may levy the execution, and dispose of the money, or tobacco, or goods, chattels, and estate, so recovered, in the same manner as the estate contained in the schedule is thereby directed to be disposed of.

Another clause of the Statute provides, that if the garnishee, on oath, denies the claim made upon him, in whole, *or 751 in part, the Sheriff or prisoner may claim the residue against the garnishee, by legal process: And another clause authorises any of the creditors to proceed against the garnishee.

This Statute is very inaccurately penned, but upon the whole Statute, the fair construction is, that the prisoner, or creditor, proceeding against the garnishee under the two last clauses above cited, must proceed in the name of the Sheriff, in whom the former provisions of the Statute, had vested all the interest of the prisoner (which was within the operation of the Statute,) in all property, whether it was embraced in the schedule or not, or whether it was in the possession of the prisoner, or in that of some other person claiming under him, or adversely to him. The Statute could not have intended to give to the Sheriff, the prisoner, and creditor, a concurrent right to sue for the same thing, at the same time. Besides, the fund when recovered, was to be disposed of by the Sheriff, as directed by the Act, in paying the creditors at whose instance the debtor was in custody.

The Act requires the prisoner to deliver a schedule of his whole estate, and to swear that it does contain his whole estate. The prescribed oath is in very detailed terms, to show that it contains all valuable interests, legal and equitable, of all possible descriptions. The clause, directing that before he is discharged, the prisoner shall transfer and deliver the personal estate contained in the schedule, and convey the real estate therein, has not the effect of dispensing with the obligation on the prisoner, to put into his schedule, property (belonging to him, or in which he has an interest,) in the possession of others, whether adversely, or not, or property which he cannot, for any cause, deliver. If it did, then, as to all which he could not deliver, and therefore, did not put into the schedule, he would be required to swear falsely; and the Act supposes, that property in the schedule may not be delivered, or be capable of delivery, and 752 prescribes the means *of getting possession of such property, after the discharge of the prisoner. The true construction of this provision is, that it is directory to the Court, or Magistrates, who act in discharging the prisoner, that they shall be required to transfer and delivery of all, which it appears to them, ought to be, and can be transferred and delivered before the discharge. The failure of the party to put into his schedule property in which he has an interest, whether in his possession, or in that of another, and the failure of the Court, or Justices, to require the previous delivery of all that can be delivered, cannot impair the effect of the Law, which vests in the Sheriff all such interest, whether the property be contained in the schedule, or not, or be in the possession of the prisoner, or some other holding adversely to him.

If, therefore, Long had any interest in this property, which was at all subject to the operation of the Statute, it vested in the Sheriff, and the question is, whether his Deed passed that right to the purchaser under the circumstances which appeared. Although the Statute in terms directs the Sheriff, within sixty days, to sell, at public sale, all the interest vested in him by Law, whether the property is in the schedule, or not, or whether it be in his, or the prisoner's possession, or in that of some other, (and upon the idea that this was the effect of the Law, the Sheriff appears to have acted in this case,) yet I think, upon the whole Law taken together, the fair meaning of it is, that the Sheriff shall sell all that is delivered, or otherwise comes to his possession, and not that which, although contained in the schedule, is in the possession of others than the insolvent. The directions of the Statute, as to the mode of recovering and disposing, after recovery, of property so situated, leads to this construction. Whether the slave in question was, or was not embraced in the schedule, she did not come within the terms of that clause, which directs the mode of proceeding against a garnishee, having possession of property claimed by the insolvent in *his schedule. The slave was in the possession of the prisoner, and not of his daughter, and there was no person against whom the Sheriff could sue out a summons, or bring an action, but Long himself. The Law could hardly have interded to put the Sheriff, in any case, to the necessity of suing the insolvent for the property in his possession, whether put into the schedule, or not. He might have lawfully taken possession of this property, if any title to it vested by Law in him. If he had taken possession of her, it would perhaps have been inconsistent with the spirit of the Law, to have sold her whilst Long's interest, which was to be sold, was uncertain and disputed. I do not mean to give any opinion, whether if the Sheriff had any interest in this property, so situated, he would have been acting properly, or improperly, in selling that interest as he did, whether he had reduced the property to his possession, or not. But, admitting, that in making such sale, he acted against the terms or spirit of the Statute, then the question occurs, whether his sale and conveyance would be utterly void, and not pass his title. I do not think it would be void. In the case of a public officer empowered to sell the property of another, he has no general property in the subject. The general property remains in the owner until it is divested by a sale and conveyance of the property in the regular mode prescribed by Law; and if the officer is in possession of the property before the sale, he has only a special property, for special purposes, as any other bailee: he has only an authority, to the valid exercise of which, a strict pursuance of the terms of his authority must be shown. If he has not conformed to those terms, he has acted without authority, and his act is not binding or valid. Thus, in a sale for taxes, by a public officer, no title passes, unless it is shown that he pursued the direction of the Law, for he had no title to pass, and was only authorised to pass the title of another, in a prescribed way. But, in the case at Bar, the legal title vested in the Sheriff, according to the express terms of the Statute, (if, 753 indeed, he had any interest *or power whatever in or over the property,) and his conveyance transfers the title, as the conveyance of any other Trustee passes the legal title, no matter how directly he may have acted against the purposes or directions of the Trust. This is fully settled by the decisions of this Court, not on the ground that the Trustee is presumed to have acted according to the terms of his trust, but (even if he had acted directly against them, and if that appeared on the face of the Deed,) because the Deed of him who has the legal title, necessarily carries that legal title to the grantee. The terms of the Act, in relation to the disposition of the insolvent's property, are directory to the Sheriff. If he violates his duty, disregarding those directions, the sale is not, therefore, void, in point of Law, as to the purchaser. But, he is responsible, as any other Trustee, to the parties interested in damages, or, if the circumstances justified it, a Court of Equity would hold the purchases to be a Trustee, standing in the shoes of the Sheriff.

I think, therefore, that if the slave in question was identified as one intended to be conveyed, (a question for the Jury,) that the title of the Sheriff, if he had any, passed to the purchaser. Whether the Sheriff had any title, depends upon the question, whether personal property given to another, by Deed, not recorded, and the possession remaining with the donor, passes to the Sheriff, upon the donor's taking the oath of an insolvent debtor. This I consider as the serious question in the cause. This depends upon the construction of the terms of the Statute, which provides that "all the estate which shall be contained in such schedule, and any other estate which shall be discovered to belong to the prisoner, for such interest therein as such prisoner hath, and may lawfully depart withal, shall be vested in the Sheriff," &c. The doubt arises upon these expressions, for such interest therein as such prisoner hath, and may lawfully depart withal. A fraudulent conveyance is good between the parties, and is not avoided as to purchasers, by the Statute of the 13th *of Elizabeth, which avoids such only, as to creditors: nor, if of personal property, by the 27th of Eliz. which avoids only such conveyances of real property, in respect to purchasers alone; a distinction carefully preserved in our Statute of Frauds; the consequence of which is, that "if a man that is a debtor make a deed of gift of all his goods, to protect the taking of them in execution for his debts, this deed of gift is void against those to whom he was indebted, but against himself, his own executors or administrators, or any man to whom he shall after sell or convey them, it is good. Bacon's Use of the Law, 62. But, such a conveyance might be void as to a subsequent purchaser, at Common Law, under circumstances, as if the donor remained in possession, and afterwards sold to a purchaser without notice, as was the case of Williamson v. Farley, Gil. Rep. 15.

The expression under consideration, was taken from the Statute of Bankrupts in England, but in rather a different context. The first Act relating to bankrupts in England, 34 and 35 H. 8th ch. 4. authorises the Lord Chancellor, and other Officers, or any three of them, in case of bankruptcy, to take such orders, and directions, as they may think proper, in their discretions, with the bodies of the bankrupts, "and with their lands, tenements, fees, annuities, and offices, which they have in fee simple, fee-tail, term of life, term of years, or in right of their wives, as much as the interest, right, and title of the same offender shall extend or be, and may then lawfully be departed with, by the said offender, and also with their money, goods, chattels, wares, merchandises, and debts whatsoever. And to cause their said lands, tenements, fees, annuities, offices, goods, chattels, wares, merchandises, and debts, to be searched, viewed, rented, and appraised, and to make sale of the said lands, tenements, fees, annuities, and offices, as much as the same offender may then lawfully give, grant, or depart with, or otherwise to order the same, for true satisfaction and payment of the creditors,"

756 *&c. The Act of 13th Eliz. ch. 7, provided that the Commissioners of Bankruptcy might take order and direction at their discretion, with the body of the bankrupt, "and also with all his lands, tenements, and hereditaments, as well copy or customary hold, as freehold, which he shall have in his own right, before he became bankrupt, and also with all such lands, tenements, and hereditaments, as such person shall have purchased, or obtained, for money or other recompense, jointly with his wife, children, or child, to the only use of such offender, or of or for such use, interest, right, or title, as such offender then shall have in the same, which he may lawfully depart withal, or with any person or persons of trust, to any secret use of such offender, and also with his money, goods, chattels, wares, merchandises, and debts, and cause the said lands, tenements, fees, annuities, offices, goods, chattels, wares, merchandises, and debts, to be searched, viewed, rented, and appraised to the best value they may, and to make sale of the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all deeds, writings, and evidences, touching the same, and also of all fees, annuities, offices, goods and chattels or otherwise order the same, for true satisfaction and payment of such creditors," &c.

The Statute of 1st James 1st, ch. 15, declared that the making of any fraudulent grant, or conveyance of lands, tenements, goods, or chattels, to the intent, &c. whereby his creditors shall, or may be defeated, or delayed for the recovery of their just and true debts, should be an act of bankruptcy; and that a conveyance made, or procured to be made by any, who should become bankrupt, to any of his children, or any other person, of any manors, lands, tenements, hereditaments, offices, fees, annuities, leases, goods and chattels; or to transfer his debts into other men's names; except the same be purchased, conveyed, or transferred for or upon marriage of any of his children, both the parties married, being of years of consent, or for some valuable consideration, the same might be conveyed by the Commissioners.

757 *It is obvious that the expressions of these Statutes, in respect to the interests belonging to the bankrupt, and which he might lawfully depart withal, referred only to such partial interests which might be held in lands, tenements, hereditaments, fees, annuities, and office, in all of which there might be particular interests, as for life, in tail, for years, tenancy by the curtesy, and dower; and these words were introduced for the purpose of limiting the power of the Commissioners to any such partial interest which might belong to the bankrupt: accordingly they could not dispose of any thing more in land, in which he had an estate tail, than the bankrupt held, until by the 21st of Jas. 1st, ch. 19, sec. 12, the Commissioners were authorised to convey entailed lands in fee. Those words did not, in the terms of the Statutes, taken literally, apply to money, goods, chattels, wares, merchandises and debts. In these personal subjects, as the Law was then held, there could be no such partial interests, the gift of such for a time, being a gift forever. The discrimination made by the Statutes in the application of those terms, to real, and not to personal property, proves that the Legislature had in contemplation to provide, by the use of that expression, only for the case of partial interests, and not for that of property fraudulently conveyed, whether the conveyance was avoided by the Common Law, or by the Ancient Statutes of 3 H. 7 ch. 4, as to fraudulent Deeds of Gift of goods, and 50 Ed. 3, ch. 6, as to fraudulent assurances of lands or goods. The Statute of the 13th of Eliz. ch. 5, and of the 27th of Eliz. respecting conveyances to defraud creditors and purchasers, had no existence when the first Statute of Bankrupts was passed, and the first of them was passed at the same time as the Statute of Bankrupts of the 13th of Elizabeth.

Our Act of May, 1726, ch. 3, sec. 30-31, for the relief of insolvent debtors, after prescribing the schedule to be subscribed, and the oath to be taken by the insolvent, declares, "that all the tenements, 758 and hereditaments, which shall be contained in such schedule for such use, interest, right, or title, as such prisoner then shall have in the same, which he may lawfully depart withal, and also all goods and chattels, whatsoever, in such schedule also contained, shall be vested in the Sheriff;" thus adopting the precise expressions of the Statutes of H. 8, and of Eliz. of Bankrupts, and using the words, for such use, interest, right and title, as such prisoner then shall have in the same, which he may lawfully depart withal, in the same context, and to the same purpose as in the English Statutes in reference to the partial interests which the prisoner might then have in real property, and to that only.

In November, 1762, ch. 8, an Act of Bankruptcy was passed, which retained the same words, for the same purpose; "and thereupon all lands, tenements, and hereditaments, in such schedule contained, for such use, interest, right or title, as such debtor shall have in the same, which he may lawfully depart withal, or dispose of, and all slaves, goods, and chattels whatsoever, in such schedule contained, and also all outstanding debts, and all the estate real and personal, of such debtor, in possession, reversion, or remainder, and all his effects whatsoever, at the time of executing such schedule, though not contained therein, shall be vested in the assignees," &c. This Act, for the first time, directed the property not contained in the schedule to be vested in the assignees. This Act, which was temporary, did not repeal the Act for the relief of insolvent debtors then in force, and which was re-enacted in November, 1769, ch. 3, sec. 7, 8, 9, and the provision of the Act of 1762, in respect to property not contained in the schedule, was adopted from that Act. In this Act of 1769, the provision for vesting the prisoner's property in the Sheriff was in the very words of the Act now in force, and has continued so in all the subsequent Revisals of the Laws.

From this re-view of the Laws for the relief of insolvent debtors, compared with the Statutes of Bankrupts, from 759 *which they were in part taken, it is clear, that the Act of 1726, re-enacted in 1748, and of 1769, referred only to the extent of the interest in the debtor, in the real property, in respect to the quantum of his estate, and not to the question, whether property, fraudulently transferred by the debtor, in fraud of his creditors, or subsequent purchasers, should or should not pass to the Sheriff, or assignee. That question was left to be decided, both as to real and personal property, as if the Statutes had simply provided, that all rights, interests and property of the debtor, should vest in the Sheriff, or assignees, for the benefit of the creditors. As to the Act of 1769, and those subsequent, to the same effect, although they use the same expressions as to the interest of the debtor, which he could "lawfully depart withal," in a somewhat different context, so as to be applicable to all the property, real and personal, (and if they had been originally used in that context, might have left it doubtful, whether the Legislature intended thereby to designate the debtor's quantum of interest in the subject, or the quality of his interest in respect to his capacity to convey or transfer it,) yet I do not think the Legislature intended to use these expressions in the latter Laws, in any other sense than they were used in the former, the context being varied in the latter, only for the purpose, always attended to in our Revisals, of condensing the Statutes into the shortest possible compass.

Upon the questions, whether property, fraudulently conveyed or transferred, and the conveyance or transfer void as to the creditors, by the 13th of Eliz. ch. 5, or as to purchasers, by the 27th of Eliz. (from which our Statute of Frauds is in part compiled,) vests in the assignees of a bankrupt, or not, I do not find any very satisfactory authority in the English Books. Those questions could only have arisen in the short interval between the 13th and 27th of Eliz. and the 1st of Jas. 1; for, at the latter period, a Statute passed, declaring that the making or causing to be made, a fraudulent grant or conveyance, was 760 an act of *bankruptcy; so that the title of the assignees overreached by relation, the fraudulent grant or conveyance, yet there might be cases of fraudulent transfers of property, to defraud creditors, which did not amount to an act of bankruptcy, as were all transfers of property, by any means other than by Deed, as by transfer of a Bill of Exchange; and in such cases, the assignees were held, from the time of Worseley v. De Mattos, 1 Burr. 467, to be entitled to the property so transferred, the transfer being void as to them, for the fraud. But, in all these cases, the fraudulent transfer was upon the eve of bankruptcy, and with an immediate view to it. Worseley v. De Mattos, 1 Burr. 467; Willson v. Day, 2 Burr. 827; Hague v. Rolleston, 4 Burr. 2, 174; Alderson v. Tem- ple, 4 Burr. 2, 235; Linton v. Bartlet, 3 Wils. 47; Harman v. Fisher, Cowp. 117. The case, however, of Anderson v. Maltby, 2 Ves. jr. 244, was a case in which a father and two sons being in partnership, and their affairs in a critical situation, in 1784, one of the sons then retired from the partnership upon terms, as to the re-payment of his capital with profits, which were manifestly intended to secure the funds of the father and the other son, who continued the business, against their creditors subsequent to the time when the other son retired. Upon these principles, the accounts were settled in 1784, and the retired son received, at different times from 1784, up to 1788, when the firm failed, very large sums; and these transactions were set aside for fraud, and the account directed to be settled upon just principles, upon a Bill filed by the assignees of the bankrupts, the Lord Chancellor declaring, that "assignees have all the equity the creditors have, and may impeach transactions, which the bankrupt himself would be stopped from impeaching." In this case, too, the parties had their final bankruptcy in contemplation, when the impeached transactions took place. But, in all cases, fraudulent conveyances are made in fact, or are presumed in Law, from the circumstances, to be made in contemplation 761 of insolvency, *and to defraud the creditors of the party. Upon the principles of these cases, I should think, that if the Statute of Jas. 1, had not been made, although a fraudulent conveyance in fraud of creditors, would not have been an act of bankruptcy, yet it would have been void as to the creditors represented by the assignees, and the title would have vested in them, the commission of bankruptcy being considered to many purposes a Statutory Execution. Doe v. Rutledge, Cowp. 705. Lord Hardwicke, in Walker v. Burrows, 1 Atk. 93, seems to countenance this conclusion. The Bill was filed by the assignees of the father, who became bankrupt in 1740, to set aside as fraudulent, a Deed made by him in 1718, it being a voluntary settlement after marriage, for the use of himself for life, for his wife for life, and then to his eldest son, &c. The questions were; first, whether it was void as to creditors under the 13th Eliz. ch. 5? Secondly, whether it was void as to subsequent purchasers under the 27th of Eliz.? And thirdly, whether the property passed to the assignees under the 1st of Jas. 1? Lord Hardwicke held, that it was not void as to creditors under the 13th of Eliz. because it did not appear that the father was indebted when he made the conveyance: that it was void, being voluntary, under the 27th of Eliz. against a purchaser for valuable consideration, but, that assignees of a bankrupt were not purchasers for valuable consideration, they standing in the place of the bankrupt, and bound by all acts fairly done by him, and that the title vested in the assignees by force of the Statute 1st Jas. 1, the conveyance not being made upon marriage, or upon valuable consideration. From this it appears, that this Deed, made twenty-two years before the bankruptcy, (if the father had been proved to have been indebted at the time of the conveyance, so as to have made the Deed void as to creditors,) would have been void as to the assignees, and the property vested in them under the 113th of Eliz. not as subsequent purchasers, but as clothed with the rights of the creditors.

762 *If property transferred in fraud of creditors, vested in the assignees of a bankrupt by force of the Statutes of H. 8, and Eliz. of Bankrupts, it would vest in the Sheriff, under our Act for the relief of insolvent debtors, for the same reasons, upon the construction of the Statutes of England and our Acts, and upon the general principles of the Common Law applying to both cases.

A creditor, under whose Execution a debtor is taken and discharged, under our acts for the relief of insolvents, could never have had any further remedy upon his Judgment, except against the property of the debtor, acquired since his discharge, until by the Act of 1819, a Ca. Sa. was declared to bind all the debtor's real property, (1 Rev. Co. p. 528, § 10,) and by the Act of 1820, ch. 34, § 4, all his personal property. By force of these Acts, the creditor has a lien on all the property, real and personal, of his debtor, from the moment the Ca. Sa. is executed which he might enforce against property fraudulently conveyed, whether the property vested in the Sheriff or not. But before these Statutes passed, the creditor could have no remedy for recovering satisfaction out of property fraudulently conveyed, unless it vested in the Sheriff, for the satisfaction of the creditor's demand.

And the passing of the Acts of 1819, and 1820, can have no effect upon the construction of the former Acts, which ought to have prevailed before those Acts were passed. The chief object of these Acts being to present a debtor whilst in custody, from disposing of his property in satisfaction of other debts, which he could do before they were passed.

In this case, if it appeared to the satisfaction of the Jury, that the slave in question had always remained in the possession of Joshua Long, the gift to his daughter was void, whether made by parol, or by deed, and whether he was indebted at the time of the gift or not. If by parol, the gift was void as between the parties by the Act of October, 1787, ch. 22. (1 Rev. Co. p. 432, § 51,) or if by deed not recorded, it would be void, by the express provision of our Statute of Frauds. 1

763 Rev. Co. ch. 101. And in either case, the property would vest in the Sheriff, and his Deed would pass the legal title to the purchaser, even if he violated the terms or spirit of the Law, in respect to time, and manner of making the sale. The only question in this case is, whether the Deed does convey the identical property in question to Shirley.

The Judgment ought to be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded. JUDGE CABELL dissented from so much of the opinions of his brother Judges, Carr, and Green, as gives any efficacy whatever to a Sheriff's sale, and conveyance of the property of an insolvent debtor, when that property was not in the possession of the Sheriff, and had not been claimed by him, "by legal process," against those who were in possession thereof.

764 *Thomas Shirley v. Elizabeth and William Long, and Others.

August, 1827.

Gift of Personality.—Retention of Possession by Donor.—If a father give a slave to a child, and the donor retain possession of the slave, and exercise control over it, the gift is not the less fraudulent because the child always lived with the father, and the slave was always called the child's in the family and neighborhood.

Same.—Parol.—No Possession in Donee.—Effect.—A parol gift of a slave to a child, without possession in the donee, is void, as between donor and donee, and if the slave given be conveyed by Deed, (unaccompanied with possession in the donee,) and without being recorded, it is void as to creditors and purchasers.

Same.—Evidence.—If a Defendant, in his Answer, admit that a slave which he claims as a gift, was always in the possession, and under the control of the donor, with whom the donee lived, proof that the donee had the possession, is inadmissible, since it varies from the admissions of the Defendant.

Chancery Practice.—Injunction.—Bill Multifarious.—When Objection Therefor to Be Made.—If a Bill, which is in part a Bill of Injunction, be multifarious, that objection cannot be made on a motion to dissolve the Injunction. It must be made at the final hearing.

This was an appeal from an interlocutory order of the Chancery Court of Fredericksburg, dissolving an Injunction obtained by the Appellant against the Appellees, and others. The Case is sufficiently stated in the opinion delivered by Judge Green. The case was argued by the same Counsel, and at the same time, as the last Case.

August 22. JUDGE GREEN delivered his opinion.

On the 27th June, 1821, Joshua Long took the oath of an insolvent debtor, and was discharged from the custody of the Sheriff of Spottsylvania. In his schedule were these expressions: "The above is every thing," &c. (See the expressions in the statement of the last case, ante, p. 736,) the schedule also contained the following clause: "Negroes Moses, George, Sam, Peter, Beverly, Clarke, Humphrey, Bill, Ben, and Fontaine, under a Deed of Trust to Major C. Jones." Long was discharged by order of the Magistrates, without surrendering to the possession of the Sheriff, the personal estate mentioned

765 in the schedule. The *Sheriff made a public sale of all the property contained in the schedule, subject to all claims, charges, and incumbrances existing upon the property, or any part thereof, and executed a Deed on the 8th November, 1821, to Thomas Shirley, he being the highest bidder. (The purport of the Deed is fully set forth in the last case, ante, p. 737.) The property so purchased by Shirley, was very large, but greatly incumbered; in some instances, nay as to the far greater part, it was incumbered beyond its value, as it turned out. He purchased it for fifty odd dollars, but he states in his Bill, (and he proves) that he was a creditor of Long, to the amount of upwards of $700; that he had no lien on Long's property, and that the object of purchasing was to endeavor to secure his debt, if possible. In this he was perfectly justifiable, and if not, it is a circumstance that can have no effect upon the decision, as to his legal and equitable rights.

†Same.—Parol.—Want of Actual Possession.—Effect.—In Thomas v. Lewis, 89 Va. 83, 15 S. E. Rep. 889, it is said: "It was decided in this court in Shirley v. Long, 6 Rand. 764, that a parol gift of a slave to a son by his father, when they resided together, was void as between the donor and donee, for want of actual possession. See also, Hunter v. Jones, 6 Rand. 541; Slaughter v. Tutt, 13 Leigh 147; Tutt v. Slaughter, 5 Gratt. 364."

Joshua Long, on the 5th January, 1821, conveyed, amongst other property, in trust to indemnify a surety, two negroes, Lewis and Fanny, which were sold under the Deed of Trust, on the 6th August, 1821, and purchased by Shirley, from the purchaser at the sale, on the 28th November, 1821. Lewis remained in Long's possession until this suit was brought, and the Marshal took possession of him, under the order of the Court, made in this cause. Long sold Fanny, and two other slaves, to Thomas B. Adams, on the 11th May, 1821, for a house and lot, which Adams conveyed, at the request of Long, to his three children, Joanna, Mary and Benjamin, and Long told Adams, as the latter states in his Answer, that the reason for having the lot and house conveyed to those children, was, "that he had always told his son Benjamin, that Jim, (one of the negroes sold to Adams, and included in the Deed of Trust to C. Jones, in 1820, as was Beverly, another of the negroes sold to Adams,) should be his property; that he had made the promise to one of his daughters, of Fanny, as her property; 766 both son and daughter, *he said were satisfied with the sale of their negroes, provided they were each one third interested in the house and lot; and Long said, that his other daughter had not received any thing of him she could call her own, and therefore requested that she should be named in the Deed as one third owner of the house and lot."

Long being in possession of the land conveyed in trust for the benefit of C. Jones, and of many of the slaves embraced in that Deed, the equity of redemption of which was sold by the Sheriff to Shirley, and of the negro Bill, (who was mentioned in the schedule as being included in the Deed to C. Jones, but was not,) and Ralph; and the legal title to a part of the land conveyed to C. Jones, being in Garret Minor, this Bill was filed against Joshua Long, Elizabeth, Durret, William and Joanna Long, (the four last being the children to whom Long stated he had conveyed eight slaves,) Mary S. and Benjamin Long, Elijah D. Robins, the trustee in the Deed under which Fanny and Lewis were sold, Thomas B. Adams, Garret Minor, C. Jones, and Robert Patton, the trustee in the Deed for the benefit of said C. Jones.

The objects of the Bill were, to procure a conveyance from G. Minor to Patton, the Trustee of Jones; to have the sum due to Jones, ascertained, the property pledged for the debt to Jones, sold, and the debt paid, and the surplus, if any, paid to him; and in order to relieve this fund, to compel Adams to pay to Jones, the value of Jim and Beverly, two of the negroes pledged by that Deed, and afterwards sold by Long to Adams, and sold by him; to subject Adams to the payment to him of the value of Fanny, sold by Long to Adams, after the Deed of Trust to Robins, under which Shirley claimed: and to charge the value of the three negroes sold to Adams, on the house and lot conveyed to Long's children, claiming to charge Adams individually, only in the event of the house and lot being insufficient to pay: for a discovery of the names of eight slaves, said to be conveyed to the four elder 767 children *and to set aside the conveyances as fraudulent, so that any of them embraced in the Deed to Patton, might be applied to the payment of Jones's claim: to ascertain, also, whether Fanny and Lewis, sold under Robin's lien, and Bill and Ralph, remaining in Joshua Long's possession, were claimed as conveyed to his children, and if so, to declare Shirley entitled to Ralph, as conveyed to him by the Deed from the Sheriff, as one of the eight slaves mentioned in the schedule, and to Decree that Bill should be delivered to him, as being named in the schedule as one conveyed to Patton, when he was not, upon the ground that the conveyances to the children of Long, if they embraced those slaves, were void, and should be set aside in Equity, for fraud: and to procure an Injunction against Joshua Long, to prevent his committing waste, and against all the parties, in possession of any of the slaves claimed from eluding them.

As to the property conveyed to Patton, there remains nothing to do, since it is admitted that it was insufficient, under any circumstances, to pay Jones's claim. The claim to the value of Fanny against Adams, (or of the house and lot,) upon which the Court below has not decided; the claim to Nelly and Dice, not particularly mentioned in the Bill, but which are the negroes claimed by Elizabeth Long in her Answer; the claim to Billy and Ralph, which have not yet been claimed by any of the children; and the claim to Lewis, who is claimed by William Long, as one of the slaves conveyed by his father to him, are the only subjects remaining to be decided in the cause.

The Court of Chancery, upon the motion of Elizabeth and William Long, who answered, Joshua Long and his other children not having answered, and against whom there was a Decree Nisi, dissolved the Injunction in toto, as to all the parties, upon the ground that Shirley, claiming only under the Deed from the Sheriff, had no title, since he obtained no title but such as Long himself could have maintained, and that Long him- 768 self had by his schedule *disclaimed all title to the eight slaves conveyed to his children, and therefore, the Plaintiff, as purchaser of Long's interest, had no title to them.

The Sheriff's Deed conveys all his interest in the property before described as sold, both at Law and in Equity, vested in him by the Act of Assembly. In the Common Law case, between the Plaintiff and Joshua Long, the question as to the effect of this Deed has been examined, and it has been declared, that the eight slaves mentioned in the schedule as conveyed to the four children, were intended to be sold and conveyed by the Sheriff, if any title vested in him by operation of Law, and that his Deed would pass to the purchaser the title of such as were so conveyed to the children when that fact was ascertained, if the conveyance was void as against creditors under our Statute of Frauds.

As to the slave Bill, mentioned in that part of the schedule relating to the slaves conveyed to Patton in trust for Jones, he is expressly conveyed by the Sheriff, subject to all incumbrances. None of the children claim him, and if none should claim him, or if claiming him, the title, under which the claim is made, is found to be fraudulent and void, Shirley will clearly be entitled to that slave, he being in the schedule as property belonging to Long, and giving up expressly, and by name.

As to Ralph, if he should be ascertained to be one of those conveyed to the four children, or either of them, and the conveyance be fraudulent and void, Shirley will also be entitled to him, the Sheriff having in that case the legal title, and having conveyed it to Shirley. But, if the slave was not conveyed to the children, or either of them, Ralph still belongs to the Sheriff; or, if he has been so conveyed, and the conveyance be bona fide, and valid, he will belong to the donee.

As to the slave Fanny, claimed by Shirley, under the Deed of Trust for the benefit of Robins, she is claimed by none of the children; and if she shall not be claimed, 769 or if claimed, the claim should be fraudulent and void, Shirley will be entitled to her against Adams, clearly, as he claims under a Deed duly recorded before the sale to Adams.

As to Milley and Dicey, claimed by Elizabeth Long, by virtue of a Deed from her father, Shirley would be entitled to them, if that Deed be fraudulent and void. In respect to the slave Lewis, claimed by Shirley under the Deed of Trust to Robins, he has an unquestionable title, unless the Deed from Joshua Long to William Long for this slave, (and Humphrey, who was conveyed to Patton,) was bona fide and valid, so as to have the preference to the Deed of Trust to Robins.

As to the negroes claimed by Elizabeth and William Long, the conveyances and transfers under which they claim, are clearly void under our Statute. They state that two negroes were given to each of them, respectively, by their father, when they were incapable of knowing the fact, and that afterwards they were conveyed by Deed; and William Long states that Carter, one of those so conveyed to him, was sold by Joshua Long, who substituted Lewis in his place, and gave him a new conveyance about 1816 or 1818, for Humphrey and Lewis. They both admit that the slaves were always in the possession and under the control of their father; but, they rely that being infants, and living with their father, his possession was theirs or for them as the guardian, and that the negroes were always called theirs in the family and neighborhood. Much evidence is exhibited upon these subjects, and some attempts made to prove an actual possession in these children. But, if the proof went to that point, it would be entitled to no weight, since it would not be competent to the parties to disprove the admissions of the Defendants in their pleadings. The suggestion that the children being infants, and living with their father, his possession was theirs, or for them, is utterly futile, and if countenanced, would frustrate our Acts of Assembly; one, of which, in order to the validity of 770 a parol gift of a slave, *requires that the slave shall have come into the actual possession of, and remained with, the donee; and the other requires, in the case of a gift by Deed, that the Deed shall be recorded, or the possession really, and bona fide remain with the donee. These emphatic words of the Statutes were used for the purpose of condemning the very gifts in question, and such as these. Besides, Joshua Long treated these slaves as his own and gave Jones a Deed of Trust on one of them, Humphrey, and a Deed of Trust to Robins for another, Lewis. The original gifts of these slaves were void as between the parties, under the General Law declaring parol gifts to be void, without possession in the donee; and as to the subsequent conveyances by Deed, they were void as to creditors and purchasers, under the Statute of Frauds, they being conveyed without any valuable consideration, and the donees never having had a bona fide possession, and the Deeds not being recorded. Shirley is, therefore, entitled to Lewis; and the order dissolving the Injunction, is erroneous in toto.

As to the objection taken to the Bill as being multifarious, it is premature to decide what effect that objection, if well founded, should have at the final hearing of the cause. It ought to have had no influence upon considering a motion to dissolve the Injunction.

JUDGE CARR.

The Plaintiff filed a Bill against Long, his children, and several others. This Bill has various objects in view; among others, to discover from the four children, which of the slaves they claim, that the Deeds of Conveyance may be declared fraudulent, and the slaves decreed to the Plaintiff. Elizabeth, and William Long, are the only children of Long who have answered. She claims two slaves, Nelly and Dice; he two, Humphrey and Lewis. They both state that these slaves were given in their early infancy by parol, and afterwards, the gift confirmed in 1810, 771 *by writing; that the slaves always remained with their father, but that this ought not to impeach these gifts, as they were infants, and their father their natural Guardian, with whom they lived. William states, that his father, wishing to sell Carter, (the slave first given to him with Humphrey,) proposed to give him Lewis, and one hundred and ten acres of land in exchange, to which he agreed, and Carter was sold, and a Bill of Sale made to him for Humphrey and Lewis; that this transaction was in 1816, or 1818; that the Bill of sale was made soon after the contract, and the Deed for the land in 1820. The Bill had prayed an Injunction to restrain the removal of the slaves, and unless security were given to have them forthcoming, they should be taken into possession by the Marshal. This was granted, and the Marshal under the order took possession of several of them. After the Answers of William and Elizabeth were filed, a motion was submitted by them for a dissolution of the Injunction, and it was accordingly dissolved. This dissolution was, I presume, intended to affect the interests of Elizabeth and William only, or at most the eight negroes claimed under the Deed of the Sheriff, and mentioned in Long's schedule as given to his children. The various other subjects and interests involved in the Bill, I do not consider as affected by it. This idea is founded on the order of the Chancellor, stating "that the Court is of opinion that the Plaintiff, by virtue of his purchase of the effects of Long, as contained in the schedule, obtained such title only as Long himself could maintain, and the said Long by his schedule disclaiming any title to the eight slaves therein mentioned, the Plaintiff, as purchaser of Long's interest, has no right to the said slaves, &c., doth order that the Injunction be dissolved, &c." The remarks made in the action of detinue, show that on this point, I differ from the Chancellor toto cœlo. The reasons of that difference need not be repeated.

Still I have felt considerable doubt whether this Interlocutory Order ought to be reversed. I have a pretty strong 772 *impression that the Bill is not sustainable; it strikes me as being multifarious, and also that so far as relates to these negroes, a Court of Law is the proper forum. I consider the pretext, that the Plaintiff did not know their names, merely colourable. There could hardly be a necessity on this point, of a discovery from the claimants. The other seven stood on the same ground with Sarah, for whom the action of detinue is brought, and as I think, properly brought. I feel more doubtful whether these objections should be taken to the Bill in this stage of the proceedings, as there has been no demurrer, or plea. On this point, I will not divide with my brethren, if they should think such objections can only be taken by the Court at the final hearing.

JUDGE CABELL, as in the former case, dissented from so much of the opinions of the other Judges, as gives any efficacy whatever to a Sheriff's sale and conveyance of the property of an insolvent debtor, when that property was not in the possession of the Sheriff, and had not been claimed by him, "by legal process," against those who were in possession thereof.

The objection to the Bill as being multifarious, he thought was premature.

The Decree of the Chancery Court was reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

AMBIGUITY.

A latent ambiguity in a written instrument may be explained by parol evidence; or terms used which have no definite legal signification, may be construed by the custom of trade, or the acts of parties; but where there is no ambiguity, parol evidence is inadmissible.

Bowyer v. Martin & Carraway, 525

ANSWER.

If a Defendant in his answer, admit that a slave which he claims as a gift, was always in the possession of the donor, he cannot be allowed to give evidence that he, the donee, had the possession, for such evidence varies from the Defendant's admissions.

ARBITRATION.

1. A Court of Law may annul an award, (for misbehaviour of arbitrators, &c.) made by virtue of a submission under a Rule of Court, pending a suit, although the Statute does not apply to such awards.

Graham's Adm'r's v. Pence, 529

2. If arbitrators decline to act, then, at the instance of one of the parties, are prevailed on to act, authorising that party to give notice to his adversary of the time and place for arbitrating the matter; and proceed at the time and place on ex parte evidence, notwithstanding the protest of the other party; this is such misbehaviour as should annul the award. Ibid.

ASSIGNED BOND.

If in debt by an assignee, the Defendant pleads that he has paid the debt to the Plaintiff, it is not allowable to give in evidence any set-off against, or payment to, the assignor: he should also have pleaded payment to the assignor before notice.

BAIL.

1. A bail bond which recites the Writ at the suit of A. B., Administrator, &c. 774 *while the Writ is at the suit of A. B. Executor, &c. is not an error for which a Judgment against the Defendant and Bail will be reversed.

CONTINUANCE.

1. Circumstances under which a continuance may be refused to a prisoner.

Bledsoe's Case, 673

2. A Court may require, under particular circumstances, that the affidavit of a witness, setting forth his testimony, shall be produced as the ground work of a continuance: and may disregard the affidavit of the prisoner, setting forth the materiality of the evidence, and specifying what he expects to prove, and proving due diligence.

2. See Evidence, No. 9.

3. An instruction of the Court to the Jury, that if they believe the evidence (reciting it, in which there is no contrariety), the Plaintiff had a right to recover, not saying any thing of the amount of damages, is not erroneous. It is an instruction on the law, not on the fact.

Pleasants v. Pendleton, 474

4. If an erroneous instruction be given to the Jury, and it appears by other Bills of Exceptions that the question on which that erroneous instruction was given, did not arise in the cause, the Judgment will be affirmed, notwithstanding the erroneous instruction.

Hunter v. Jones, 541

COVENANT.

A covenant to use reasonable diligence in collecting debts, is not a covenant to pay at all events.

Lockridge v. Carlisle, 20

*DECLARATION.

1. In debt on bond, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of an office, the Declaration need not set forth the particular persons from whom money was received, nor the sums received from each, nor the time when the breaches were committed, if it appears that they occurred during the continuance of the Defendant in his office; nor is it necessary to state the damages occasioned by the breaches.

Allison v. Farmers' Bank, 204

2. It is not necessary for the Declaration, after assignment of breaches, to allege that the Plaintiff has been injured by the breaches; it is enough to state that an action has accrued to the Plaintiff to demand and have the penalty of the bond. Ibid.

3. In an action for the penalty of a bond, it is not necessary to state, that in consequence of the refusal of the Defendant to pay, the Plaintiff sustained damage. Ibid.

4. See Special Demand.

5. See Trespass, No. 7.

DECREE.

1. If there be two Decrees on the same day against a Defendant's land, the whole, and not the moiety only, of the land, ought to be directed to be sold, on the ground, that at Law, two Judgments would each have taken a moiety, if it had been extendible.

Coleman v. Cocke, 618

2. If sundry parties claim, that a debtor's land should be sold to discharge their respective liens, an Interlocutory Decree, which does not decide on the validity of the respective liens, nor the order in which they shall be paid, but directs the land to be sold for cash, and to be paid into Bank to the credit of the cause, is erroneous, because it has a tendency to sacrifice the property, by discouraging the creditors from bidding.

Cole's Adm'r v. M'Rae, 644

3. The Decree may be right as to a sale of chattels, they being perishable, and as they may be sold in detail, are not liable to be sacrificed. Ibid.

4. The lands should have been put into the hands of a receiver, to be rented out till the rights of the creditors are ascertained. Ibid.

DEED.

A Deed from a Sheriff, which conveys all the right, title and interest vested in the Sheriff by law, in and to eight negroes, conveyed by an insolvent to his children, without naming the negroes, is sufficiently descriptive to pass them. The identity of the negroes is matter of proof, and as soon as they are indentified, the Deed operates on them.

Shirley v. Long, 736

DEED OF TRUST.

1. If a Deed of Trust be fairly executed, to secure a just debt, it cannot be impeached for fraud for any matter ex post facto.

Clayton v. Anthony, 285

2. If the Deed of Trust, and the sale under it be fair, the Sheriff who levies a Fi. Fa. on the goods sold and in the possession of the purchaser, is a trespasser, and an action lies against him. Ibid.

3. And if the sale be fraudulent, yet as the Deed is good, it still operates, (in the same manner as if there has been no sale,) to protect the property from the execution of the creditors of the original debtor. Ibid.

4. Whatever surplus remains, after paying the debt secured by the Deed of Trust, is liable to the claims of other creditors, but it cannot be reached by Fi. Fa. before a sale under the Deed, for it is an equitable and contingent interest. Ibid.

DEMURRER.

1. See Judgment, No. 1.

2. After issue joined on any plea, it is too late to file a special demurrer.

Roane's Adm'r v. Drummond's Adm'rs, 182

3. Where pleadings terminate in a demurrer on either side, any error in the previous pleadings, on either side, may be taken advantage of. Ibid.

DEPOSITION.

1. If there be no objection made to the regularity of a deposition in a Court of Law, the Court of Appeals will presume it was properly taken, although there is neither a commission nor notice in the record.

Tompkins & Co. v. Wiley, 242

2. A deposition ought not to be read in a Court of Law, unless the party offering it proves that he has used due diligence to find the witness or that he is not within the jurisdiction of the Court and the reach of its process. Ibid.

*DESCENTS.

1. The Act of Descents of 1785, (since re-enacted,) entirely repealed and abrogated the Common Law Course of Descents, and all the principles thereof. Davis v. Rowe, 355

2. If an intestate dies, (without children, or their descendants, without a father, or mother, brother, or sister, but having had a brother and sister, both of whom died before him,) leaving a niece, the only child of the brother, and two nieces and two nephews, the children, of the sister, the real estate will descend, and the personal estate be distributed to all of these nieces and nephews, per capita, and not in stirpes, they being all of the same degree of consanguinity to the intestate. Ibid.

3. In such case, the estate will not be divided into moieties, to be given, the one moiety to the child of the brother according to the Common Law doctrine of jus representation is, and the other moiety to the four nieces and nephews, but it will be divided into five equal parts, each niece and nephew taking one, jure proprio. Ibid.

4. If in such case, the two nieces, (children of the deceased sister,) be dead before the intestate, living the two nephews, and the niece, (the child of the brother,) and one of the two deceased nieces has left two children, and the other six children, the estate will still be divided into five parts; of which, one part will be allotted to the niece living, another to each of the nephews, one other part to the two children of the deceased niece, and the other fifth part to the six children of the other niece; and this, on the principle contained in the 16th section, that if a part of those in the same degree be dead, and a part living, the issue of those dead shall take per stirpes, that is, the share of their deceased parent. Ibid.

5. Although the 16th section does not provide, in terms, for the case of a brother and sister dying before the intestate and leaving an unequal number of children, and does not in words declare what portion of the inheritance shall descend to those children, yet the spirit of that section, taken in connection with the first and fourth sections, justify the construction that they will take per capita. Ibid.

DETINUE.

See Trespass, No. 4, 5, 6.

DEVISE.

1. See Distribution.

2. A devise of lands to the son of the testator for life, 'and in case he should have heirs lawfully begotten, that he shall, or may dispose of the said land to either, or amongst the said heirs, as he shall think proper, but in case that my son should die without such heirs, then my Will is, that the said lands be equally divided amongst my daughters,' gives a fee tail, converted by the Act of Assembly into a fee simple. Ball v. Payne, 73

DISTRIBUTION.

Testator devised 'all the rest and residue of the money arising from the sales of my estate, and debts due to me, to all my dear grand-children, who shall attain their ages of twenty-one years, to be invested in Bank stock by my Trustees, for the use of my grand-children, or such of them as are now born, or may be born before distribution, and who shall attain that age,' &c. The period of distribution above mentioned, means the time when the first legatee shall come of age, and have a right to demand his aliquot part, to the exclusion of all others, who should be born after that period.

Lyoña v. Turner et ux., 41

EMANCIPATION.

1. A promise by a master to emancipate his slave, after the performance of a certain condition, cannot be enforced by a Court of Equity, even though the condition be complied with. The Jurisdiction of Equity extends only to cases where the pauper has a legal right to freedom, but there is some impediment to the assertion of the right in a Court of Law.

Sawney v. Carter, 173

2. A Deed of Emancipation of a slave, executed in 1781, (at which time emancipation was not permitted, except in certain cases, (although it directs the freedom to commence when he should come of age, that is, in 1796, is absolutely void.

Moses v. Denigree, 561

3. The devise in Pleasants v. Pleasants, was supported, because the Testator directed that his slaves should have their freedom, when the Laws would permit it; but here, there is no such condition: 777 *it is an absolute Deed, unlawful when made and not rendered lawful by the circumstance that the Law did afterwards permit emancipation. Ibid.

4. The Act of Pennsylvania of 1780, for the gradual abolition of slavery, clearly includes all negro and mulatto children born of slave mothers after the passage of the Act, except in the cases excepted by the 10th section, such as domestic slaves attending on Delegates to Congress, &c.

Spotts v. Gilaspie, 566

5. If, therefore, a citizen of Pennsylvania, after the passage of the Act bequeath a female slave to a citizen and resident of Virginia, and after the legatee's title has accrued the slave have a child born in Pennsylvania, and the child be then brought to Virginia by its master, the child is free, and may recover its freedom in our Courts. Ibid.

6. But the mother is still a slave, and though her children born in Pennsylvania are free, those born in Virginia are slaves. Ibid.

7. A Deed of Emancipation, by which the master manumits his slaves at his death, but directs that they shall serve him as long as he lives, and at his death go free from all persons, passes a present right to freedom, reserving a right in the grantor to their personal services during his life, as a condition of the emancipation. Therefore, a child born of one of the emancipated females in the interval between the execution of the Deed and the death of the grantor, is free from its birth.

Isaac v. West's Ex'or, 652

8. If the construction of a Deed of Emancipation be doubtful, resort may be had to the rule, that the Deed is to be taken most strongly against the grantor, and to the spirit of the Laws of all civilized nations, which favors liberty. Ibid.

EQUITY.

12. Where a vendor sells a lot of land by parol, puts the purchaser in possession and receives the purchase money, but conveys a different lot, on a Bill filed by the purchaser, requiring the vendor either to correct the mistake by conveying the lot really purchased, or to refund the money, a Court of Equity, on being satisfied that the vendor had no title to the property sold, will rescind the contract, and decree the money to be refunded.

Lamb v. Smith, 552

13. It is not the province of a Court of Equity to see that justice is done in the abstract in all possible cases, but only to lend its aid, when from any cause without his own default or neglect, a party Defendant at Law, cannot have justice done him in the Courts of Law; and this is true, where the discounts, abatements, or damages which are claimed to be set-off in Equity, arise out of a breach of the same contract on which the Judgment at Law is founded.

Cabell's Ex'ors v. Robert's Adm'rs, 580

14. Therefore, where C. bound himself to pay 100l. to R. for grain to be delivered by him for a fixed price, and within a certain time, and R. bound himself to C. to deliver grain of 100l. value, and R.'s Adm'rs sued

C. on the bond, and recovered Judgment for the 100l., Equity will not relieve C. for his payments, and discounts were a proper subject of defence at Law: or, if R. failed to comply with his contract, C.'s remedy was at Law, on the bond executed by R. Ibid.

15. Equity will not decree the rescission of an executed contract, merely on the ground of an ignorance of Law, where there is neither fraud, concealment, nor mistake, in fact.

17. Where a Plaintiff goes into Equity for a settlement of accounts, on the ground that he cannot substantiate the items in his account, except by the Answer and testimony of the Defendant himself, and in the progress of the suit, it appears 778 by his own showing, *that the account is susceptible of proof by witnesses, in a Court of Law, his Bill should be dismissed.

18. A Bill in Equity does not lie to recover damages for breach of contract merely sounding in damages. Ibid.

ESCAPE WARRANT.

FORGERY.

1. It is not necessary to set forth in an Indictment the persons whom the prisoner procured to forge the instrument or with whom he acted and assisted in the forgery. A general description, in the words of the Statute, is sufficient.

Huffman's Case, 685

2. An Indictment which charges that the prisoner caused and procured a certain instrument to be forged, and willingly assisted in the forgery, is to be understood as charging that he caused it to be done in his presence, and that he aided, being present: that is, that he was principal in the second degree, not an accessory. Ibid.

3. A forged paper is passed by a prisoner bearing date in 1828: immediately after, with the knowledge of the holder, the prisoner alters the date to 1827. The Indictment sets forth its tenor, and describes it as dated in 1827. The paper is proper evidence in support of the Indictment, notwithstanding the proof that it bore date in 1828, when passed. Ibid.

4. See Examining Courts, No. 1, 2.

FRAUD.

1. A slave is mortgaged, and afterwards sold to the mortgagee; the bill of sale is not recorded, and the vendor retains possession, such sale is fraudulent, as against a subsequent purchaser; and Equity will, under the particular circumstances, entertain the suit of the purchaser for the recovery of the slave against the fraudulent vendee, who had clandestinely got possession of him. Nor can such fraudulent vendee prevent a recovery by showing that the Plaintiff did not take possession at the instant of his purchase, for such omission cannot make good the fraudulent sale.

Glasscock v. Batton, 78

2. In debt on a bond, a plea that the bond was obtained by fraud, covin, &c., without saying whether the fraud was in the consideration of the bond, or in its execution, is immaterial.

FRAUDS, Statute of.

1. If C authorise H to say to a merchant, "that he C would pay for any goods sold to his son-in-law L," or to any merchant of whom L "might purchase, or might wish to purchase goods, that he would pay for L" a certain sum; this is a collateral promise, and being verbal, is void under the Statute.

Cutler v. Hinton, 509

2. An entry in the merchant's books against L is strong evidence against the merchant that he is dealing with L and not with C, but if the entry be against C., such entry is not evidence for the merchant, so as to make that an original, which would otherwise have been a collateral promise. Ibid.

3. The Statute of Frauds is a wise, and salutary law, and should be fairly, and fully carried into execution by the Courts. Ibid.

4. There having been a written agreement on a sale of land, that the purchaser shall search for coal for a limited time, and on finding it shall pay an augmented price for the land; a parol agreement, varying the written agreement, by extending the time for the search, is within the Statute, and will not be enforced by a Court of Equity.

Heth's Ex'or v. Wooldridge's Ex'or, 605

FRAUDULENT GIFTS.

1. A slave is given to an infant, by Deed, with a reservation expressed in the Deed that the donor is to keep the slave, and raise it for the donee, until she arrives to the age of thirteen. The slave is delivered to the donee on the day of the execution of the Deed, and on the same day is taken back by the donor. The Deed is never recorded: the donee never lived with the donor. The gift is void under the Act of Assembly concerning gifts of slaves, and the Donee having past the age of 13, cannot recover the slave from the donor.

Durham v. Dunkly, 135

2. A gift of slaves can only be evidenced by a Deed or Will, duly proved and recorded, or by possession passing from the donor to the donee, and remaining with the donee, or some one claiming under him. Ibid.

3. The possession here meant is an actual, abiding, permanent possession. Ibid.

4. A parol gift of a slave by a father to an infant child living with him, by a declaration that the gift is made without delivery of possession, is not good against a subsequent purchaser of that slave, although such purchaser knew, at the time of his purchase, that the father had so made the gift.

Hunter v. Jones, 541

5. See Insolvents, No. 2, 3, 4.

6. If a father give a slave to a child, and the donor retain possession of the slave and exercise control over it, the gift is not the less fraudulent, because the child always lived with the father and the slave was always called the child's in the family and neighborhood.

Shirley v. Long, 764

7. A parol gift of a slave to a child, without possession in the donee, is void, as between donor and donee; and if the slave given be conveyed by Deed, (unaccompanied with possession in the donee,) and without being recorded, it is void as to creditors and purchasers. Ibid.

GAMING.

The distinctive feature in the character of the games, called A. B. C. and E. O. and Faro Bank, is, that the chances of the game are unequal, all other things being equal, and those unequal chances are in favor of the exhibitor of the games, or tables. If other games resemble those standard games in that distinctive feature, they come within the terms of the 17th section of the Gaming Act, being "gaming tables of the same or like kind, and are liable to the penalties denounced against those standard games, whatever may be the denomination of those other games, and whether played with cards, dice, or in any other manner. Under this construction, the exhibitor of a gaming table, called Hap-hazard, alias Snickup, &c. held to be liable to the same punishment with the exhibitor of Faro Bank.

*GUARDIAN.

1. If an Administratrix settles her accounts as such, in which a balance is found due to the estate of the intestate, and then she qualifies as Guardian of the infant children of the intestate, and receives their distributive shares into her hands, the sureties in the Administration Bond, are absolved from the claim of the distributees, and the sureties in the Guardians' Bond are bound to them.

Myers v. Wade, 444

2. A Guardian cannot apply any part of the principal of the infant's estate to his education, or maintenance, without the previous consent of the Court appointing the Guardian, according to the provisions of the 26th section of the Act concerning Guardians. Ibid.

3. A parent who is Guardian of his children, is more bound than others to a strict observance of this rule, for there is a natural, if not a legal obligation on all parents to support their children, if of ability to do so. Ibid.

4. If the expense of maintaining and educating infant wards, exceeds their annual income, until they become of age to render service; and if, when they arrive to that age, their services are equal to their support, the surplus of expenditure during the former period, ought to be set-off against the income of their estates during the latter period, till they arrive to the age of 21 years. Ibid.

5. Guardians in Socage, and Testamentary Guardians, (although they have no beneficial interest,) yet have a legal interest, accompanied with the possession of the Ward's land during the Guardianship. If, therefore, a person trespass on the lands of an infant, and cut and carry away his trees without the license of the Guardian, the Ward cannot maintain trespass, but the Guardian may, and he must account to the Ward for the damages recovered.

Truss v. Old, 556

6. If the trees are cut and carried away by permission of the Guardian, no trespass is committed, and the infant, even after the Guardianship has ceased, cannot maintain trespass for the act. The wrong must be compensated to the Ward by the Guardian. Ibid.

7. It seems that if timber trees, growing on the inheritance of the Ward, are thrown down by tempest or otherwise, they become personal property, and the Guardian has a legal right to sell them as being perishable, and of no value, except as a subject of sale, and in such case, the infant cannot bring trover for them. Ibid.

HAND-WRITING.

1. The evidence of a witness as to hand-writing, who has formed an acquaintance with it, from seeing the party write, or from a course of correspondence, is not rendered incompetent, nor its weight impaired, by his having referred to papers in his own possession, known to be written by the party, to refresh his (the witness's) memory.

Redford's Adm'r v. Peggy, 316

2. Qu. Is the evidence of a witness, who has frequently seen the Testator write his name to receipts; and who has resorted to those receipts to refresh this memory; who testifies, that he believes the body of the Will and signature to be the hand-writing of the Testator, though he forms that belief from comparison, and would not be able to prove the hand-writing, except from comparing it with the signature to the said receipts, competent to prove the hand-writing? The Court, of four Judges, was equally divided. Ibid.

3. Qu. May not a Court of Probate resort to a comparison of hand-writing? Ibid.

INDICTMENT.

1. In an Indictment with three counts, if in the third count it is omitted to be stated that the Grand Jury, "on their oath," present, (the first two counts being regular in that respect,) the objection is obviated by the fact, that the Record states, that the Grand Jury were sworn in open Court.

INFANT.

Although it is a general rule, that an infant Defendant is not bound by a Decree, if *when he arrives of age, he can show error in it, yet it seems, that where a Decree is obviously for his benefit, his rights may be absolutely bound by it.

Brown v. Armistead, 594

INJUNCTION.

1. A creditor cannot have the aid of a Court of Equity to prevent, or interfere with in any way, the disposition that a debtor may make of his property, unless the debtor has first proceeded as far as he can at Law. To subject real estate, he must have obtained a Judgment at Law, and to subject personalty, he must have Judgment and Execution.

Rhodes v. Cousins, 188

2. It is an irregular proceeding in a Chancellor, to dissolve an Injunction in Court, with a direction, that the order of dissolution should not go out; and then in vacation, to direct that the order should go out.

Randolph v. Randolph, 194

3. See Appeal, No. 1.

4. Where an Injunction is granted, and a material fact is alleged in the Bill, and not denied in the Answer, such fact must be taken as true on a motion to dissolve; and no other proof will be required on such motion. Ib.

5. The owner of slave property, which has been taken by virtue of an Execution against another's goods and chattels, is entitled to an Injunction to stay the sale, though he neither alleges nor proves the peculiar value of the property.

Harrison v. Sims, 506

6. When a Chancellor refuses to re-instate an Injunction, on new proofs of the allegations of a Bill, a Judge of the Court of Appeals has a right, on an appeal to him, to re-instate it.

Webster v. Couch, 519

7. In a Bill of Discovery, if the Defendant makes no discovery, but on the contrary negatives the allegations of the Bill, the Injunction awarded on the Bill, should be dissolved. Ibid.

8. If a Bill, which is in part an Injunction, be multifarious, that objection cannot be made on a motion to dissolve the injunction. It must be made at the final hearing.

Shirley v. Long, 764

INSOLVENTS.

1. When a debtor takes the insolvent oath, and delivers in a schedule, the Sheriff is vested by the Act of Assembly, with all the insolvent's estate, interests and rights, whether they are named in the schedule, or not, and whether the property be in the possession of the debtor, or in that of any other person.

Shirley v. Long, 735

2. If an insolvent debtor, having made a fraudulent gift of a slave to a child, in his schedule disclaims all title to the said slave, the Law vests in the Sheriff the legal title to the slave, the gift being void, and he may recover it in a Court of Law from the debtor, who still retains possession of it. Ibid.

3. The Sheriff has the right to sell, and to pass by Deed, a slave, or other chattel, which the insolvent debtor has made a fraudulent gift of to his child, (but of which the debtor retains possession,) and the purchaser under such sale may recover the slave, or other chattel, although the sheriff had not possession of it, at any time. By two Judges. Ibid.

4. If the property so fraudulently given, be not in the possession of the insolvent debtor, but of some other person, although the title vests in the Sheriff, it seems that he cannot sell the property, but must proceed by summons against the person holding it, under the 35th and 36th sections. Ibid.

5. The Sheriff is a Trustee for the creditors, and if he violates his trust, or the spirit of the Act, by selling the chattels improperly, he is responsible like other Trustees, but the sale is not void, and the purchaser may recover. Ibid.

6. See Deed.

INTEREST of Money.

1. The vendee of land, on a credit, to whom a Deed is made, and possession given, is not excused from paying interest on the purchase money, because of the payment of the principal having been delayed by the adverse claim and suit of a third party, the vendee during all that time having enjoyed the issues and profits of the land.

Selden v. James, 465

2. The covenant of the vendor was to sell and convey a perfect title, (which was done, as proved by the result of the trial,) not that there should be no claimants; he has not, therefore, committed a breach of his covenant; in this, there is no excuse for non-payment of interest. Ibid.

3. The vendee's costs in defending the suit cannot be set off against the interest. Ibid.

783 *4. To excuse the vendee from paying the interest, it is not enough that he should be ready and willing to pay the principal; it ought to appear that he kept it useless and unproductive by him, and that he gave the vendee notice of that fact. Ibid.

5. In this case the Commonwealth being the claimant, who proceeded by Inquisition of Escheat, the supposed seizin in Law in the Commonwealth, upon office found, did not prevail over the actual seizin of the vendee, who, as he actually enjoyed the rents and profits, is not excused from paying interest by that supposed seizin. Ibid.

JEOFAILS.

In debt on a Judgment for 50l. 19 10, the verdict finds for the Plaintiff the sum of 50l. 'that being the debt in the Declaration mentioned;' the error is in the sum only, which may be regarded as surplage, and the verdict is cured by the Statute of Jeofails. But the Judgment being for the lesser sum, the Defendant cannot complain of it.

Roane's Adm'rs v. Drummond's Adm'rs, 182

JOINT OBLIGATIONS.

1. A sealed instrument, written in the singular number, but signed and sealed by two persons, is joint and several.

Holman & Wilson v. Gilliam, 39

2. Where a joint Judgment is obtained against two Defendants, and one dies, an action of debt on the Judgment lies against the representative of the deceased Defendant, the Law respecting joint rights and obligations being applicable to joint Judgments.

Roane's Adm'rs v. Drummond's Adm'rs, 182

JUDGMENT.

1. A demurrer to the Declaration is filed, and also a demurrer to the evidence, and the Court decide against the demurrer to the Declaration; whereupon, the jury find a verdict for the Plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court on the demurrer to evidence. The Court render final Judgment for the Plaintiff. This shall be considered as a Judgment on the demurrer to evidence, in favor of the Plaintiff.

Holman & Wilson v. Gilliam, 39

2. The mode in which a party must avail himself of a former Judgment for the same cause of action is by plea in bar, or in an action of assumpsit, by evidence on the general issue.

Cleaton v. Chambliss, 86

3. A former Judgment cannot be pleaded in bar, unless it was directly upon the same point, and between the same parties or privies. Ibid.

4. A Judgment between the same parties, upon the same point, which, if pleaded, would have been a perfect bar is, when used as evidence under the general issue, not conclusive on the Jury, but only evidence to be weighed by them. Ibid.

5. A Judgment, when assets, refers to the time of the plea pleaded; and as to assets received after that time, no enquiry can be made in that suit.

Gardner's Adm'r v. Vidal, 106

JURISDICTION.

1. Where the principal sum demanded, together with the interest, is of sufficient amount to give jurisdiction, the Court of Appeals will take cognizance of the Case.

Stratton v. Mutual Assurance Society, 22

2. A Judgment was rendered in the Superior Court of Chesterfield, on the 15th November, the day on which the General Court is directed by Law to be held at the Capitol: the distance is judicially known to be not more than three hours ride from one place to the other. It does not appear on the Record but that the Judgment might have been rendered in time to enable the Judge to close that Court, and attend at the Capitol to his duties as one of the General Court, on the same day. The Superior Court had jurisdiction to render the Judgment on that day.

Mendum's Case, 704

3. Qu. May not a Superior Court extend its Session into the appointed Term of the next succeeding Superior Court, so that the Judge may leave himself time to open his next Court by 4 o'clock of the third day? Ibid.

4. Qu. May not a Judge, if the business of the Court imperiously require it, keep open a Court so long as that he cannot go to the succeeding Court in time to open it? Ibid.

LARCENY.

*LEGACIES.

1. Although legacies do not stand on as high ground as debts, yet if the personal fund be inadequate, or if there be expressions in a Will tending to show that the Testator had the land in his mind, a Court will make them a charge on the land, rather than they shall go unpaid.

Downman v. Rust, 587

2. Therefore, where a single woman, having but little personal property, and real estate of considerable value, having only one brother, who would have been her heir and distributee, by her Will bequeaths pecuniary legacies, and makes the brother executor and residuary legatee, she must be considered as intending that the legacies should be paid out of the land; and they were decreed to be a charge upon it. Ibid.

3. A purchaser of the land from the devisee, with notice of the legacies, is bound to see to the application of the purchase money, and the land held to be chargeable in his hands for the legacies: not on the ground of fraud, but on the principle of caveat emptor. Ib.

LIMITATIONS—Act of.

Martin v. Anderson, 19

LUNATIC.

A committee of a lunatic, appointed by a Chancellor, is a mere Commissioner of the Court, managing the person and estate of the lunatic, under the direction of the Chancellor, and is responsible to the Court as a receiver, removable in its discretion, and not liable to be sued at Law on claims, either against the lunatic himself, or his estate, as in the case of a committee appointed under the Statute.

MERGER.

Allison v. Farmers' Bank, 204

MILLS.

1. Where a Corporation claims a right to abate a mill-dam as a nuisance, because it obstructs the navigation of a stream, and such abatement would produce great loss to the mill owner, and great inconvenience to the public, a Court of Equity has jurisdiction to prevent such abatement, and to preserve to the mill-owner his establishment, until the question, whether the mill-owner has, or has not, a right to keep up his dam be decided.

Crenshaw v. Slate River Company, 245

2. The inadequacy of the damages, which any Jury could give to the mill-owner, in a suit against a Corporation, for the loss and injury sustained by him, by the removal of his dam, is also a good ground for the interposition of Equity. Ibid.

3. Although grants of lands to individuals may include the bed, and banks of streams or rivers, yet the public have a right to the use of all such streams for the purposes of navigation: but the Legislature (representing the sovereign power,) may confer on individuals, by general Law, or particular grants, rights in opposition to, and paramount to this public right and such paramount rights have been conferred on owners of mills, by the General Law authorising the Courts to establish mills. Ibid.

4. A grant by the County Court, to erect a dam and establish a mill, (after the precautionary proceedings prescribed by the General Law, have been adopted,) is a perfect one, and vests in the grantee all the public right to the stream, or so much of it as is necessary to the full enjoyment of the mill erected under the order. Ibid.

5. After a dam and mill have been erected according to Law, another Act of Assembly, which imposes on the owner of the dam heavy burthens for the benefit of navigation; and on his failure to do what is thus onerously laid on him, vests in a company the power to abate the dam as a nuisance, without a full indemnification, and equivalent for the injury thus done to his vested rights, is unconstitutional and void. Ibid.

MISNOMER.

A suit instituted in one name will not justify a Declaration and Judgment 785 in another; *therefore, when a Plaintiff has two baptismal names, and a mistake is made in the second or middle name, it is a misnomer, and is a fatal error, not only on a plea in abatement, but on a Judgment by default.

Ming & Green v. Gwatkin, 551

MURDER.

1. To constitute murder in the first degree, it is not necessary that the premeditated design to kill, should have existed for any particular length of time. If therefore, the accused, as he approached the deceased, and first came within view of him, at a short distance, then formed the design to kill, and walked up with a quick pace and killed him without any provocation then or recently received, it is murder in the first degree.

Whiteford's Case, 721

2. The Legislature, in their description of offences which constitute murder in the first degree, has at first enumerated some of the most striking instances of deliberate and cruel homicide; but finding it impossible to enumerate all of them then proceeded, by general words to embrace all kinds of wilful, deliberate and premeditated killing. It is improper to interpolate the word "such" in that general description.

Ibid.

3. It seem, that the offence of homicide, by a workman throwing timber from a house, into the street of a populous city, without warning, or of a person shooting at a fowl animo furandi, and killing a man, are instances of murder in the second degree.

Ibid.

MUTUAL ASSURANCE.

1. On a motion for quotas by this Society, the Act of Limitations is no defence, because the Declaration for insurance is a sealed instrument.

Stratton v. Mutual Assurance Society, 22

2. A purchaser from one who has insured the property, is liable for quotas, upon motion, as well as an original subscriber.

Ibid.

3. If a Defendant in such motion does not object that he is not assignee, in the Inferior Court, it is too late to make the objection in the Appellate Court.

Ibid.

4. Quotas due before the Act of 1822, may be recovered by motion, before a sale under that Act.

Ibid.

5. The 7½ per cent. imposed by the Society to indemnify them for the expenses incurred in the employment of collectors are not usury, nor in the nature of a penalty, but stipulated damages.

Ibid.

6. A Judgment "that the Plaintiff recover damages, and expenses, according to law, and the rules and regulations of the Society," without specifying the amount, or nature of the damages and expenses, is erroneous for uncertainty.

Ibid.

NE EXEAT.

A Writ of Ne Exeat cannot be granted unless, 1st. There is a precise amount of debt positively due: 2d. It must be an Equitable demand on which the Plaintiff cannot sue at Law, except in cases of account, and a few others of concurrent jurisdiction: 3d. The Defendant must be about to quit the country, proved by affidavits as positive as those required to hold to bail, at Law.

Rhodes v. Cousins, 188

NEW TRIAL.

1. After a trial at Law, a Court of Equity will not grant a new trial, merely because injustice has been done, but the party applying for the new trial must show that he has done every thing that could be reasonably expected from him, to obtain relief at Law.

Faulkner's Adm'x v. Harwood, 125

2. After a verdict and judgment at Law, Equity will not grant a new trial, on the ground of newly discovered evidence, unless the applicant has used proper diligence to procure such evidence before the trial at Law, or the case is involved in great doubt and obscurity.

Arthur v. Chavis, 142

NON EST FACTUM.

1. The plea of Non Est Factum, whether general or special, must conclude to the country: and in such case, the Plaintiff cannot reply any new matter. He must either accept it by a similitur or demur.

Cleaton v. Chambliss, 86

2. The consent of an obligor, to an alteration of the bond, given after the alteration is made, will not repel the plea of Non Est Factum; but a consent 786 *given before or at the time of, the alteration, will be considered as a re-execution.

Ibid.

NONSUIT.

1. The damages of $5, given by Act of Assembly in case of non-suits, ought to be awarded in all cases of dismissals and discontinuances, produced by a voluntary abandonment of the cause by the Plaintiff, after the Defendant's appearance, whether in the Office, or in Court, and such dismissals ought to be entered up as non-suits.

675

2. But the dismissal of a suit for a failure to give security for costs, is not such a voluntary failure to prosecute as authorises this Judgment. Nor in case of a Retraxit ought these damages to be awarded.

Pinner v. Edwards, 675

NUISANCE.

To maintain a public prosecution for a nuisance, (in damming up the waters of a creek, whereby they became stagnant, and the air corrupted and infected,) it is necessary in the Indictment to allege, and on the trial to prove, that the obstructions produced the nuisance, in or near a public highway, or in some other place in which the public have a special interest.

PARENT AND CHILD.

1. Where a father, being indebted to his children, afterwards conveys property to them, which is more than equal to the amount of the debt, this conveyance shall be presumed to be in satisfaction of the debt, if there are no circumstances to prove a contrary intention.

2. Although the property conveyed, and the debt, are not ejusdem generis, the one may be a satisfaction of the other, if the intention of the testator be apparent, that such should be the effect.

Tomlinson's Adm'r v. Mason, 169

6. See Demurrer, No. 2, 3.

7. A Defendant files four pleas, one general, and three special. The third plea, which is the second special plea, is bad, and the fourth plea, being the third special plea, is good. The Record states, that the Plaintiff objected to the reception of the third special plea, which objection was over-ruled. There is no other designation of the plea which was objected to, than its number. The Appellate Court having no other guide than the Record, decided that the objection to the third special plea was properly over-ruled.

Coleman v. Cocke, 618

3. Though the Deed of such bona fide purchaser be not duly recorded, yet he will be protected in his purchase against a creditor of the father, who obtains a Decree against the father after the bona fide purchase so made, because such a purchase has a prior equity to such creditor. Ibid.

Fa. should not be awarded against them the principal recognizor is not a competent witness for them, to show that the Sci. Fa. should not be awarded.

Commonwealth v. Craig, &c., 731

2. If at a subsequent Term of a Court, after the default of the principal has been recorded, the sureties, on a rule against them, can show, to the satisfaction of the Court, that the principal was rendered unable, by reason of wounds and sickness, to appear at the proper Court, the Court may spare the recognizance, and decline awarding a Sci. Fa. Ibid.

3. In showing cause against the rule, affidavits are admissible without requiring the presence of the witnesses in Court, if the Court be satisfied that they have been fairly taken. Ibid.

SALES OF CHATTELS.

1. In contracts of sale of chattels a constructive delivery is sufficient to pass the right of property; an actual delivery, either in fact or Law, not necessary.

Pleasants v. Pendleton, 473

2. A merchant sells to another merchant one hundred and nineteen barrels fine flour, lying in a certain warehouse: the barrels have on them the brands of eight different mills; the price is agreed on; the vendee gives a check on the Bank for the agreed price of the whole quantity, the vendor at the same time gives to the vendee a bill of parcels, specifying the number of barrels of each particular brand, and an order on the warehouse-man for the flour, and a receipt in full for the price of the flour. This is a complete and executed contract, and the property in the flour was passed to the vendee. The warehouse and all its contents, including the flour and the check, being burnt the next morning, before the actual delivery of the flour, the loss is the vendee's, and the vendor may recover the price. Ibid.

3. It having been proved to be the usage when barrels of flour are delivered by a warehouse-man to a purchaser, to charge the cooperage if any is needed, to the storer, and also the storage. and to deliver the flour to the order of the storer, when called for such a sale as that above mentioned does not come within that class of cases where something remains to be done by the vendor to complete the contract. Ibid.

4. In this case, there were in the same warehouse, at the time of the sale, a great many other barrels of fine and superfine flour belonging to other persons, but none of them had the same brands as those the subject of this sale, and the vendor instead of one hundred and nineteen, had in fact one hundred and twenty-three barrels of fine flour; that is, four more of two of the same brands, than he had actually sold; but, it was proved, that between barrels of the same brand and quality, there is no difference in price. The one hundred and twenty-three were easily distinguishable from the whole mass in the 788 *warehouse; and although the one hundred and nineteen were never separated from the other four, yet the former number belonged to the vendee, and the latter to the vendor, and it was of no consequence which were the individual barrels which should be subducted as unsold all the barrels of the same brand being exactly of the same value. The property in the one hundred and nineteen barrels passed to the vendee, notwithstanding the want of separation. Ibid.

5. A case in 4 Taunt. 24, in which it was held, that Trover would lie for one thousand nine hundred and six-nine Spanish dollars, intermixed in a barrel which contained four thousand seven hundred, and eighteen much relied on. Ibid.

6. An established usage constitutes the common understanding of parties, and may be resorted to as the interpreter of the contract. An usage, that flour in store is sold by order, and passes, by the transfer of the order, from hand to hand, without an actual delivery of the flour, is a reasonable usage, and ought to be enforced as part of the contract. Ibid.

SCIRE-FACIAS.

Where two obligors are sued, and both die pending the proceedings, though it is not expressed which of them died first; on a Scire-Facias against the Administrator of one of them, who does not demur to the Sci. Fa. nor plead a variance between it, and the proceedings on which it issued, but pleads to issue, it must be understood that the other obligor died first, and that the action survived against the obligor, against whose representative the Scire Facias was sued out.

5. A son acting for his father, removed, with his father's slaves, from Maryland to Virginia, in March, 1797; bought a farm for his father, and settled the slaves on it. He took the oath, within sixty days, prescribed by Law in such cases. The father also removed shortly after, but did not take the oath. The Law was complied with; for, though the son was not the owner, he was the importer, and the agent of the owner. The negroes adjudged to be slaves.

Montgomery v. Fletcher, 612

6. In a prosecution under the last clause of the 13th section of the Act concerning slaves, &c. against a Defendant for permitting a number of slaves more than five, to be and remain on his lot or tenement, it is not necessary for the Commonwealth to prove that they remained thereon more than four hours at any one time.

Booth's Case, 669

7. The object of the first clause of the section, is to protect private rights; that of the last clause, to guard the public against assemblages which might be dangerous or injurious in a much shorter time than four hours.— Ibid.

8. Qu. Does the last clause of that section apply to the assemblage of any other negroes than slaves? Ibid.

9. The proof must correspond with the allegation, and therefore, if the Information charges an assemblage of negro slaves, it must be proved that they were so. Ibid.

SPECIAL DEMAND.

In debt on a Bill Penal, it is not necessary that the Declaration should aver a special demand of the principal sum; nor need it be proved. The institution of the suit is the demand. Interest may be recovered without such special demand.

SUPERIOR COURTS.

See Jurisdiction, No. 2, 3, 4.

TRESPASS.

1. To maintain Trespass quare clausum fregit, there must be an actual possession in the Plaintiff, when the trespass was committed.

Cooke v. Thornton, 8

789 *2. And therefore, such an action will not lie for any damages resulting from the ouster of the Plaintiff, after the trespass was committed, unless the Plaintiff has regained the possession. Ibid.

3. See Deed of Trust, No. 2, 3.

4. If a Plaintiff bring Trover or Detinue for a horse, and Trespass for taking the same horse, a Judgment for the Defendant in the action of Trover or Detinue, is a good bar to the action of Trespass.

Hite v. Long, 457

5. In Trespass he might have recovered damages, not only for the force and violence, but for the value of the horse; but having elected to sue for the horse only, or its value, he is bound by his election. Ibid.

6. A Plaintiff cannot be allowed to sever one cause of action, and carve two suits out of it; therefore, if the trespass consists in the Defendant's stopping the Plaintiff's waggon and team, and taking by force from the team, a horse claimed by the Defendant, the Plaintiff might in Trespass recover damages for the injury in stopping his team, delaying him, &c. as well as the value of the horse taken; but if he elects to bring Trover for the horse taken, he cannot maintain Trespass for stopping the team, &c., for it was one act. Ibid.

7. A Declaration in Trespass, which does not allege that the Plaintiff has property in the thing taken, is bad on demurrer. Ibid.

8. If a Declaration in Trespass charges the Defendant with taking a horse from the Plaintiff's possession, but not his property, and with stopping his waggon and team, the residue of the horses being the Plaintiff's property, a plea, which avers that this horse was geared with the others, that the Plaintiff's waggoner endeavoured to carry off the Defendant's said horse, by driving his team violently, and that the Defendant stopped the team, to re-take his horse, using no more force than was necessary for that purpose, is a good plea, the Defendant being justifiable in thus stopping the team for that purpose. Ibid.

9. Possession is indispensably necessary to support Trespass quare clausum freight.

USAGE OF TRADE.

USURY.

If to a Bill to foreclose a mortgage, the Defendant pleads usury, and the Bill itself on its face, and the documents filed with it, present a case of usury, such as is pleaded, it is not necessary for the Defendant to take depositions to support his plea. His adversary's Bill supports his plea.

Lane's Ex'x v. Ellzey, 661

VENUE.

In this State, it is not error that the Venue is laid in one County, and the action brought in another, unless the Defendant is an inhabitant of another County, and moves to dismiss the suit for that cause.

Payne v. Britton's Ex'or, 101

VERDICT.

1. A verdict upon the plea of Fully Administered, ought to ascertain the amount of assets in the hands of the Defendant, at the commencement of the suit, and at the time of the plea pleaded.

Gardner's Adm'r v. Vidal, 106

2. See Judgment, No. 5.

3. A verdict which merely finds that assets sufficient to pay the Plaintiff's demand, "have come" to the Defendant's hands, without saying when, is erroneous. Ibid.

4. When a verdict is set aside, as to one issue, it must be set aside in toto. Ibid.

5. See Jeofails.

6. If an Indictment charges an offence to have been committed by Richard, and the verdict abridges the name by finding the prisoner Richd. guilty, the verdict is not erroneous.

Poindexter's Case, 668

7. If a person be indicted for grand larceny, and the Jury convict him of petit larceny, without ascertaining the value of the goods stolen, the verdict is sufficient. Ibid.

8. A verdict which does not ascertain what goods were stolen, nor their value, nor whether they are forthcoming, or not, &c. but merely finds the prisoner guilty of petit larceny, on an Indictment for grand larceny, is not erroneous. Ibid.

*WIDOW.

If a widow, who is also Administratrix of an estate, appropriates the profits to the purchase of slaves, or other personal property, and afterwards she and her second husband agree to consider the property so purchased as part of the intestate's estate, (in lieu of accounting for the estate,) and to take the property so purchased as part of her dower, or distributable share for life, such arrangement is binding on them, and on purchaser from them, so as to vest the title, after the death of the widow, in the distributee of the first husband, in like manner as if that particular property had belonged to the intestate in his life-time.

Hunter v. Jones, 541

WILLS.

1. A Court of Probate occupies the place of a jury as to facts, and ought to find all proper inferences from facts proved.

Smith v. Jones, 33

2. Where the Court refuse to admit a Will to Record, on the ground of a defect of testimony, and it appears before them, that the desired evidence may probably be procured, if time is allowed, they ought to allow such further time, even though they may have pronounced Judgment, and while the Judgment is still in their power. Ibid.

3. What evidence is sufficient to sustain a Will of real estate. Ibid.

4. By the Ecclesiastical Law, which as to proof of Wills in Court of Probate, is still our Law, two witnesses are necessary to prove Wills of chattels.

Redford's Adm'r v. Peggy, 316

5. Two of the Judges decided that as to olograph Wills, the rule is different. They thought that by our Statute, an olograph Will of lands may be established by the evidence of one uncontradicted, and unimpeached witness, and that on the principle of omnia major, &c. such a Will of chattels might be so proved. The other two Judges present did not decide the point. Ibid.

WRIT OF RIGHT.

1. In a Writ of Right brought by several Demandants, the mise is joined on the mere right, and the Jury find for the Demandants, with the addition of this fact, that one of the Demandants was dead before the institution of the suit, leaving children. This latter clause shall be rejected as surplusage, and the remainder of the verdict received.

Garrard, &c. v. Henry,

2. So, if the Jury add, that one of the Demandants was tenant in common with the others, and therefore, could not maintain this writ jointly with them, this, like the other finding, being matter of abatement, cannot be given in evidence, nor found by the Jury, on the mise joined, but must be pleaded in abatement. Ibid.

3. See Abatement, No. 2.
